F Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY, BOWEN and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ.), reported [1893] 1 Ch. 630, reversing a decision of ROMER, J., in an action brought by the respondent company against the appellant claiming an injunction to restrain him from breaking a covenant entered into by him in a contract between the parties, specific performance of the covenant, and damages. The appellant G contended that the covenant was void as being in restraint of trade and against public policy, oppressive, or going beyond what was reasonably necessary for the protection of the respondent company.

The appellant in person.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., and W. F. Hamilton for the company.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

H July 31, 1894. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The question raised by this appeal is, whether a covenant entered into between the parties can be enforced against the appellant, or whether it is void as being in restraint of trade. The covenant in question was contained in an agreement of Sept. 12, 1888, and was in these terms:

I “The said Thorsten Nordenfelt shall not during the term of twenty-five years from the date of the incorporation of the company [July 17, 1888], if the company shall so long continue to carry on business, engage, except on behalf of the company, either directly or indirectly in the trade or business of a manufacturer of guns, gun mountings, or carriages, gunpowder, explosives, or ammunition, or in any business competing or liable to compete in any way with that for the time being carried on by the company, provided that such restriction shall not apply to explosives other than gunpowder, or to subaqueous or submarine boats, or torpedoes, or castings or forgings of steel or iron, or alloys of iron or of copper. Provided also that the said Thorsten Nordenfelt shall not be released from this restriction by the company ceasing to carry on business merely for the purpose of reconstitution or with a view to the transfer of the business thereof to another company, so long as such other company taking a transfer thereof shall continue to carry on the same."

The agreement also provided that the appellant should, for seven years from the incorporation of the respondent company, retain the share qualification of a director, and should act as managing director of the company, at a remuneration of £2,000 a year, together with a commission upon the net profit of the company.

Before directing attention to the particular terms of the covenant, and to the considerations to which it gives rise, it is necessary to advert to the position of the parties at the time that the agreement was entered into. The appellant had, prior to March, 1886, obtained patents for improvements in quick-firing guns, and carried on, among other things, the business of the manufacture of such guns and of ammunition. In that month he procured the registration of a limited liability company, which was to take over his business, with the business assets and liabilities. On Mar. 5, 1886, an agreement was made between the appellant and the Nordenfelt Gun and Ammunition Co., by which the company was to purchase the goodwill of the appellant's business, and all the stock, plant, and patents connected therewith, he covenanting to act as managing director for a period of five years, and so long as the Nordenfelt company should continue to carry on business

"not to engage, except on behalf of such company, either directly or indirectly in the trade or business of a manufacturer of guns or ammunition, or in any business competing or liable to compete in any way with that carried on by such company."

The agreement for purchase was duly carried into effect, and the price was paid to the appellant, namely, £237,000 in cash, and £50,000 in paid-up shares of the company. In July, 1888, negotiations were entered into for the amalgamation of the Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co., Ltd., and the Maxim Gun Co., Ltd., and for the transfer of their businesses and assets to a new company, to be called the Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co., Ltd. By an agreement for the amalgamation of the two companies, dated July 3, 1888, and made between the Maxim Gun company, the Nordenfelt company, and P. Thane, on behalf of the new company, the Nordenfelt company agreed that they would procure the appellant to enter into the agreement which was afterwards embodied in the instrument of Sept. 12, 1888. The respondent company was incorporated on July 17, 1888, and on Aug. 8 the agreement of July 3 was adopted by the company.

It is to be noted that at the time when this agreement was entered into, to which the Nordenfelt company was a party, the appellant was managing director of that company, and that, in the memorandum of association of the amalgamated company which was signed by the appellant, the objects of the company were stated to be, inter alia, not only the adoption of the agreement of July 3, but also

"to acquire, undertake, and carry on as successors to the Maxim Gun Co. and the Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co., the goodwill of the trade and businesses heretofore carried on by such companies and each of them, and the property and rights belonging to or held in connection therewith respectively."

This is of importance because the appellant in a forcible argument pointed out that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was largely founded on the fact that the covenant in question was entered into in connection with the sale of the goodwill of the appellant's business, and was designed for the protection of the goodwill so sold, and he contended that this was an error, inasmuch as there was no sale by him of the goodwill on that occasion, he having already parted with it to the Nordenfelt company, the later sale being by that company and not by him.

A I think it is impossible to accede to this contention. Upon the sale by the appellant to the Nordenfelt company, the goodwill was conveyed to them, and was protected by a covenant in some respects larger than the one he entered into in September, 1888, but it was limited to the time during which that company should carry on business; it, therefore, necessarily ceased when the Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co. and the Maxim Co. were absorbed by the new company.

B But in the agreement for the amalgamation (to the making of which, as I have said, the appellant was a party) the covenant which the Nordenfelt company undertook to obtain from the appellant was to be in addition to the transfer by the Nordenfelt company of the full benefit of any obligations which Mr. Nordenfelt was then under to that company, and by the terms of the memorandum of association of the new company, the object was, as I have shown, stated to the world to be

C the acquisition of the goodwill of the Nordenfelt company. In view of these facts, I think that the case must be treated on precisely the same footing as if the obligations of the covenant under consideration had been undertaken in connection with the direct transfer to the respondents of the goodwill of the appellant's business and with the object of protecting it.

The appellant mainly relied upon the fact that the covenant was general, that is

D to say, unlimited in respect of area, and argued that it was, therefore, void. I think it was long regarded as established, as part of the common law of England, that such a general covenant could not be supported. In early times all agreements in restraint of trade, whether general or restricted to a particular area, would probably have been held bad; but a distinction came to be taken between covenants in general restraint of trade, and those where the restraint was only

E partial. The distinction was recognised and given effect to by PARKER, C.J., in his celebrated judgment in Mitchel v. Reynolds (1). That was a particular restraint, and the covenant was held good, the Chief Justice saying (1 P.Wms. at p. 182):

"Wherever a sufficient consideration appears to make it a proper and a useful contract, and such as cannot be set aside without injury to a fair contractor, it ought to be maintained. But with this constant diversity, namely,

F where the restraint is general not to exercise a trade throughout the kingdom, and where it is limited to a particular place; for the former of these must be void, being of no benefit to either party, and only oppressive, as shall be shown by and by."

At a later part of the judgment, after dividing voluntary restraints by agreement into those which are, first, general, or, secondly, particular, as to places, or persons,

G he formulates with regard to the former, the following proposition (ibid. at p. 185):

"General restraints are all void, whether by bond, covenant, or promise, etc., with or without consideration, and whether it be of the party's own trade or not."

In Master, etc., of Gunmakers v. Fell (2) (Willes at p. 388), WILLES, C.J., said

H the general rule was

"that all restraints of trade which the law so much favours, if nothing more appear, are bad . . . but to this general rule there are some exceptions, as, first, if the restraint be only particular in respect to the time or place, and there be a good consideration given to the party restrained."

I As I read the authorities, until the cases to which I shall call attention presently, the distinction between general and particular restraints was always maintained, and the latter alone were regarded as exceptions from the general rule, that agreements in restraint of trade were bad. In Horner v. Graves (3), TINDAL, C.J., said (7 Bing. at p. 741):

"The law upon this subject [i.e. restraint of trade] has been laid down with so much authority and precision by PARKER, C.J., in giving the judgment of the Court of B.R. [King's Bench] in the case of Mitchel v. Reynolds (1), which has been the leading case on the subject from that time to the present, that little more remains than to apply the principle of that case to the present. Now the rule laid down by the court in that case is, 'that voluntary restraints, by agreement between the parties, if they amount to a general restraint of trading by either party, are void, whether with or without consideration, but particular restraints of trading, if made upon a good and adequate consideration, so as it be a proper and useful contract,' that is, so as it is a reasonable restraint only, 'are good.'

After stating that the case then before the court did not "fall within the first class of contracts as it certainly did not amount to a general restraint," he proceeded to consider whether the particular covenant was a good one. It is true that in a later part of his judgment the following passage occurs (ibid. at p. 743):

"In the case above referred to, PARKER, C.J., says, 'a restraint to carry on a trade throughout the kingdom must be void; a restraint to carry it on within a particular place is good'; which are rather instances and examples than limits of the application of the rule, which can only be at last, what is a reasonable restraint with reference to the particular case."

But I cannot, in view of the passage which I have quoted from the earlier part of his judgment, understand this as an indication of opinion on the part of TINDAL, C.J., that there was no distinction in point of law between general and particular restraints; that in the case of both alike the only question is whether in the particular case the restraint is reasonable. If so, it could hardly be said that the law had been laid down with precision by PARKER, C.J., nor could such contracts be accurately divided into two classes, if every particular case, whether it fell within the one class or the other, was, in point of law, to be dealt with in precisely the same manner.

I am confirmed in this view of TINDAL, C.J.'s opinion by his judgment in the subsequent case of Hinde v. Gray (4). In that case the defendant had entered into a covenant with the plaintiffs, to whom he had demised a brewery in Sheffield, that he would not, during the continuance of the demise, carry on the trade of brewer or agent for the sale of beer in Sheffield or elsewhere; but would, so far as the same should not interfere with his private avocations, give all the advice and information in his power to the plaintiffs with regard to the management and carrying on of the brewery. The breach alleged was that the defendant had solicited and obtained orders for ale not purchased of the plaintiffs nor brewed by them, and that large quantities of ale had thereunder been delivered and sold. There was a demurrer to this breach, and judgment was given for the defendant, TINDAL, C.J., saying that it was "assigned on a covenant which according to a case of Ward v. Byrne (5) was void in law." This is, to my mind, only intelligible if Ward v. Byrne (5), which was the case of a bond conditioned not to follow or be employed in the business of a coal merchant for nine months, was regarded as establishing, as a matter of law, that a covenant in general restraint, though limited in point of time, was void. Unless it were so, I do not see how it could be regarded as determining that the covenant in question in Hinde v. Gray (4) was void; or, indeed, as an authority in the case of any covenant not practically identical in all respects. It is clear that there are material distinctions between the circumstances of the two cases; and, if the only question was whether the covenant was reasonable in view of the particular circumstances, considerations might well be urged (as indeed they were by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs) why the case then before the court should not be regarded as governed by Ward v. Byrne (5); but TINDAL, C.J., did not proceed to inquire whether, under the particular circumstances appearing on the record in Hinde v. Gray (4), the covenant was a reasonable one, or was wider than was requisite for the protection of the plaintiffs, but treated the case as concluded, as matter of law, by authority.

I need not further refer to Ward v. Byrne (5), except to say that, although the learned judges in that case did express an opinion that the covenant exceeded what

A was necessary for the protection of the covenantee, they seem to me to recognise that covenants for a partial restraint, and these only, are exceptions from a general rule invalidating agreements in restraint of trade. In that case, the attempt was made unsuccessfully to maintain that a covenant otherwise general might be regarded as a particular restraint if limited in point of time—a contention for which some colour was afforded by the language used in earlier cases. The views which

B I have expressed appear to me to have been entertained by that very learned lawyer Mr. JOHN WILLIAM SMITH, as shown by his notes to Mitchel v. Reynolds (1) (1 Smith, L.C. (9th Edn.) 430). He lays down the law thus :

C “In order, therefore, that a contract in restraint of trade may be valid at law the restraint must be, first, partial, secondly, upon an adequate or, as the rule now seems to be, not on a mere colourable consideration; and there is a third requisite, that it should be reasonable.”

This exposition of the law has further the very weighty sanction of WILLES, J., and KEATING, J., who, after the death of Mr. J. W. SMITH, edited the notes to his collection of leading cases.

D In the year after the decision of Hinde v. Gray (4), Whittaker v. Howe (6) came before LORD LANGDALE, M.R. Howe had covenanted not to practise as a solicitor in any part of Great Britain for twenty years, having sold his business to the plaintiff. In spite of this he commenced again practising in London where he had previously carried on business. On an application for an interlocutory injunction it was contended that the covenant was void. The Master of the Rolls refused to accede to this contention and granted the injunction. It was of course clear that

E a covenant not to practise in London, as he was in fact doing, would have been good, and it was natural that his conduct should not find favour in the eyes of the court. But the question was whether so extensive a covenant as that entered into could be supported. Mitchel v. Reynolds (1) was cited in argument; but neither Ward v. Byrne (5) nor Hinde v. Gray (4) appear to have been brought to the notice of the court. LORD LANGDALE expressed himself thus (Whittaker v. Howe (6) (3

F Beav. at p. 394) :

“Agreeing with the Court of Common Pleas, that in such cases ‘no certain precise boundary can be laid down within which the restraint would be reasonable, and beyond which excessive’; having regard to the nature of the profession, to the limitation of time, and to the decision that a distance of 150 miles does not describe an unreasonable boundary, I must say, as LORD KENYON said in Davis v. Mason (7) (5 Term Rep. at p. 120), ‘I do not see that the limits are necessarily unreasonable, nor do I know how to draw the line.’ ”

G

The learned judge distinctly indicated that he had not arrived at an irrevocable conclusion for he added :

H “In the progress of the case it may become necessary to consider further the points which have been raised, but at present I am of opinion that the right claimed by Mr. Howe to act in violation of the contract for which he has received consideration, is to say the least so doubtful, that he cannot be permitted to take the law into his own hands.”

I It is not necessary to consider whether the decision can be supported, though it was regarded by WILLES, J., and KEATING, J., as questionable, and it is certainly difficult to see why, if a covenant not to practise as an attorney in Great Britain is good, a covenant such as was in controversy in Hinde v. Gray (4) should have been pronounced bad in point of law on demurrer. But I cannot accept it as a weighty authority on the question whether it was regarded as a rule of the common law that a general covenant in restraint of trade was void, in view of the authorities to which I have already referred. There have been differing expressions of opinion on the subject by distinguished equity judges in more recent times. I will only mention two of these in which the existence of the rule I have been considering has been questioned. In Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsche (8), JAMES, V.-C., said (L.R. 9 Eq. at pp. 353, 354):

"I do not read the cases as having laid down that un rebuttable presumption which was insisted upon with so much power by Mr. Cohen. All the cases when they come to be examined, seem to establish this principle, that all restraints upon trade are bad as being in violation of public policy, unless they are natural and not unreasonable for the protection of the parties in dealing legally with some subject-matter of contract."

Again, in Rousillon v. Rousillon (9), FRY, J., thus expressed himself (14 Ch.D. at p. 369):

"I have, therefore, upon the authorities, to choose between two sets of cases, those which recognise and those which refuse to recognise this supposed rule, and, for the reasons which I have already mentioned, I have no hesitation in saying that I adhere to those authorities which refuse to recognise this rule, and I consider that the cases in which an unlimited prohibition has been spoken of as void, relate only to circumstances in which such a prohibition has been unreasonable."

I do not intend to throw doubt on what was decided in these cases, for reasons which will appear hereafter, but I respectfully differ from the view which appears to be indicated that there was not at any time a rule of the common law distinguishing particular from general restraints, and treating the former only as exceptions from the general principle that contracts in restraint of trade are invalid. The discussion on which I have been engaged is, it must be admitted, somewhat academic. For, in considering the application of the rule, and the limitations, if any, to be placed on it, I think that regard must be had to the changed condition of commerce and of the means of communication which have been developed in recent years. To disregard these would be to miss the substance of the rule in a blind adherence to its letter. Newcastle-upon-Tyne is for all practical purposes as near to London to-day as towns which are now regarded as suburbs of the metropolis were a century ago. An order can be sent to Newcastle more quickly than it could then have been transmitted from one end of London to the other, and goods can be conveyed between the cities in few hours and at a comparatively small cost. Competition has assumed altogether different proportions in these altered circumstances, and that which would have been once merely a burden on the covenantor may now be essential if there is to be reasonable protection to the covenantee. When LORD MACCLESFIELD [formerly PARKER, C.J.] in Mitchel v. Reynolds (1) (1 P.Wms. at p. 182) emphasised the distinction between a general restraint not to exercise a trade throughout the kingdom and one which was limited to a particular place, the reason which he gave for the distinction was that "the former of these must be void, being of no benefit to either party, and only oppressive, as shall be shown by-and-by." He returns to the subject later on, when giving the reasons why all voluntary restraints are regarded with disfavour by the law, in these terms (ibid. at pp. 190, 191):

"Thirdly, because, in a great many instances, they can be of no use to the obligee; which holds in all cases of general restraint throughout England; for what does it signify to a tradesman in London what another does at Newcastle? And surely it would be unreasonable to fix a certain loss on one side, without any benefit to the other. The Roman law would not enforce such contracts by an action: see PUFFENDORF, lib. 5, c. 2, s. 3; 21 H. 7, 20."

There are other passages in the judgment where this view is enforced. There is no doubt that, with regard to some professions and commercial occupations, it is as true today as it was formerly, that it is hardly conceivable that it should be necessary, in order to secure reasonable protection to a covenantee, that the covenantor should preclude himself from carrying on such profession or occupation anywhere in England. But it cannot be doubted that in other cases the altered

A circumstances to which I have alluded have rendered it essential, if the requisite protection is to be obtained, that the same territorial limitations should not be insisted upon which would in former days have been only reasonable. I think, then, that the same reasons which led to the adoption of the rule require that it should be frankly recognised that it cannot be rigidly adhered to in all cases. It appears to me that a study of LORD MACCLESFIELD'S judgment in Mitchel v. Reynolds (1) will show that, if the conditions which prevail at the present day had existed in his time, he would not have laid down a hard and fast distinction between general and particular restraints, for the reasons by which he justified that distinction would have been unfounded in point of fact. Whether the cases in which a general covenant can now be supported are to be regarded as exceptions from the rule which I think was long recognised as established, or whether the rule is itself to be treated as inapplicable to the altered conditions which now prevail, is probably a matter of words rather than of substance. The latter is perhaps the sounder view.

When once it is admitted that, whether the covenant be general or particular, the question of its validity is alike determined by the consideration whether it exceeds what is necessary for the protection of the covenantee, the distinction between general and particular restraints ceases to be a distinction in point of law. I think that a covenant entered into in connection with the sale of the goodwill of a business must be valid where the full benefit of the purchase cannot be otherwise secured to the purchaser. It has been recognised in more than one case that it is to the advantage of the public that there should be free scope for the sale of the goodwill of a business or calling. These were cases of partial restraint. But it seems to me that, if there be occupations where a sale of the goodwill would be greatly impeded, if not prevented, unless a general covenant could be obtained by the purchaser, there are no grounds of public policy which countervail the disadvantage which would arise if the goodwill were in such cases rendered unsaleable. I would adopt in these cases the test which in a case of partial restraint was applied by the Court of Common Pleas in Horner v. Graves (3) in considering whether the agreement was reasonable. TINDAL, C.J., said (7 Bing. at p. 743):

"We do not see how a better test could be applied to the question, whether reasonable or not, than by considering whether the restraint is such only as to afford a fair protection to the interests of the party in favour of whom it is given, and not so large as to interfere with the interests of the public; whatever restraint is larger than the necessary protection of the party can be of no benefit to either; it can only be oppressive, and, if oppressive, it is, in the eye of the law, unreasonable."

The tendency in later cases has certainly been to allow a restriction in point of space which formerly would have been thought unreasonable, manifestly because of the improved means of communication. A radius of 150 or even 200 miles has not been held too much in some cases. For the same reason I think a restriction applying to the entire kingdom may in other cases be requisite and justifiable. I must, however, guard myself against being supposed to lay down that, if this can be shown, the covenant will in all cases be held to be valid. It may be, as pointed out by BOWEN, L.J., that in particular circumstances the covenant might nevertheless be held void on the ground that it was injurious to the public interest.

I turn now to the application of the law to the facts of the present case. It seems to be impossible to doubt that it is shown that the covenant is not wider than is necessary for the protection of the respondents. The facts speak for themselves. If the covenant embraced anything less than the whole of the United Kingdom it is obvious that it would be nugatory. The only customers of the respondents must be found among the governments of this and other countries, and it would not practically be material to them whether the business were carried on in one part of the United Kingdom or another. So far I have dealt only with the covenant in relation to the United Kingdom. The appellant appeared willing to concede that it might be good if limited to the United Kingdom; but he contended that it ought not to be world-wide in its operation. I think that, in laying down the rule that a covenant in restraint of trade unlimited in regard to space was bad, the courts had reference only to this country. They would, in my opinion, in the days when the rule was adopted, have scouted the notion that, if for the protection of the vendees of a business in this country it were necessary to obtain a restrictive covenant embracing foreign countries, that covenant would be bad. They certainly would not have regarded it as against public policy to prevent the person whose business had been purchased and was being carried on here from setting up or assisting rival businesses in other countries; and for my own part I see nothing injurious to the public interests of this country in upholding such a covenant. When the nature of the business and the limited number of customers is considered, I do not think the covenant can be held to exceed what is necessary for the protection of the covenantees. I move your Lordships, therefore, that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

LORD WATSON.—The order appealed from directs that, for twenty-five years from July 17, 1888, the appellant shall, if and so long as the respondent company or any company taking a transfer of its business shall continue to carry on business during that period, be restrained from engaging,

“either directly or indirectly in the trade or business of a manufacturer of guns, gun mountings or carriages, gunpowder, explosives, or ammunition (except explosives other than gunpowder) or subaqueous boats or torpedoes, or castings or forgings of steel or iron, or alloys of iron or of copper.”

The prohibition is not confined to English, or even to British soil; it extends to every part of the surface of the globe available for the purpose of carrying on the process of manufacture. The order does nothing more than enforce, according to its terms, an undertaking given to the respondent company by the appellant, upon the occasion of their taking over in the year 1888, from the Nordenfelt company, the extensive business which had been established by the appellant, and had been transferred by him to the latter company in March, 1886. At the Bar of the House, the appellant, for the first time, pleaded that the undertaking given by him to the respondent company was without adequate consideration, and could not warrant the injunction of which he complains. I have all along been satisfied, for the reasons explained by the Lord Chancellor, which I shall not repeat, that the plea is groundless, and that, for the purposes of this appeal, the appellant stands in the same position as if his undertaking had been given to the Nordenfelt company, in consideration of the full price which was paid to him by that company for the stock and goodwill of his business.

The main question discussed in the courts below, and the only question which, in my opinion, it is necessary for your Lordships to decide, is raised by the appellant's contention that the personal restraint to which he has agreed to submit, being unlimited in space, is contrary to the recognised policy of English law, and is, therefore, incapable of being enforced by an English court. The decisions at common law and in equity, which bear more or less directly upon the question thus arising, are very numerous. They have been reviewed by the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, who all arrived at the same conclusion by independent lines of reasoning, which are occasionally divergent. Some of the more important of those cases have been noticed by the Lord Chancellor, and will be criticised by my noble and learned friend, LORD MACNAGHTEN. I have, as in duty bound, read and considered all the cases cited, but I do not propose to refer to them in detail. I shall simply endeavour to indicate the considerations which have led me to concur with your Lordships in affirming the order of the Court of Appeal.

With regard to the facts of this case, I have only to observe that they are, from a legal point of view, exceptional. Their parallel is not to be found in any of the reported cases; but they are such as may naturally be expected to occur, in the

- A altered and daily altering conditions under which trade is conducted in modern times. The manufacturing department of the business, which the appellant sold in 1886 was, and still is, carried on at extensive works in England and in Sweden. The business might be said to be local in that sense, but in that sense only. The area which it supplies was and is practically unlimited. The customers who buy the products, which the appellant agreed he should not manufacture, are necessarily
- B a limited class, but they are to be found all over the world. They include, or strictly speaking, consist of governments and potentates, great and small, civilised and savage, who, for purposes offensive or defensive desire to possess, and have the means of paying for, Nordenfelt guns with suitable ammunition. It does not seem to admit of doubt that the general policy of the law is opposed to all restraints upon liberty of individual action, which are injurious to the interests of the State
- C or community. Nor is it doubtful that courts will rightly refuse to enforce any compact by which an individual binds himself not to use his time and talents in prosecuting a particular profession or trade, when its enforcement would obviously or probably be attended with these injurious consequences. But it must not be forgotten that the community has a material interest in maintaining the rules of fair dealing between man and man. It suffers far greater injury from the infraction of these rules than from contracts in restraint of trade.

- I think it is now generally conceded, that it is to the advantage of the public to allow a trader, who has established a lucrative business, to dispose of it to a successor by whom it may be efficiently carried on. That object could not be accomplished if, upon the score of public policy, the law reserved to the seller an absolute and undefeasible right to start a rival concern the day after he sold.
- E Accordingly, it has been determined judicially that in cases where the purchaser, for his own protection, obtains an obligation restraining the seller from competing with him, within bounds which having regard to the nature of the business are reasonable, and are limited in respect of space, the obligation is not obnoxious to public policy, and is, therefore, capable of being enforced. Whether, when the circumstances of the case are such that a restraint unlimited in space becomes
- F reasonably necessary in order to protect the purchaser against any attempt by the seller to resume the business which he sold, a covenant imposing that restraint must be invalidated by the principle of public policy is the substance of the question which your Lordships have to consider in this appeal.

- The earlier decisions which were chiefly, if not exclusively, by the courts of common law contain abundant dicta, which, if literally followed, would sustain
- G the plea upon which the appellant relies. These dicta broadly state the rule to be that a general restraint of trade, or in other words a restraint unlimited as to space, is void, because it is contrary to the commercial policy of England. The same proposition is frequently to be found in the later common law cases. To me it seems very natural that the law should have been laid down in these broad terms. The rule of policy, as originally understood and administered, struck at all
- H restraints, whether partial or general. It was relaxed, by these decisions, in the case of partial restrictions which were held to be reasonable. I feel that, had I occupied the seat of the learned judges who pronounced them, I should probably have used the same language which they employed with reference to unlimited restraints. They never imagined that any business should attain such wide dimensions that it could not be reasonably protected from the invasion of the seller,
- I except by subjecting him to a restraint unlimited in space. I am under the impression that, had they conceived the possibility of such a case occurring, the rule might have been expressed in somewhat different terms. I think that, as stated, it was meant to involve the assumption that there could be no such case.

A series of decisions based upon grounds of public policy, however eminent the judges by whom they were delivered, cannot possess the same binding authority as decisions which deal with and formulate principles which are purely legal. The course of policy pursued by any country, in relation to and for promoting the interest of its commerce, must, as time advances, and as its commerce thrives, undergo change and development from various causes which are altogether independent of the action of its courts. In England at least it is beyond the jurisdiction of her tribunals to mould and stereotype national policy. Their function when a case like the present is brought before them is, in my opinion, not necessarily to accept what was held to have been the rule of policy a hundred or a hundred and fifty years ago, but to ascertain with as near an approach to accuracy as circumstances permit, what is the rule of policy for the then present time. When that rule has been ascertained, it becomes their duty to refuse to give effect to a private contract which violates the rule, and would, if judicially enforced, prove injurious to the community. A

No one of the noble and learned lords before whom this appeal was heard has had the least difficulty in holding that the injunction granted was reasonably necessary in order to protect the respondent company's business from the aggressive acts threatened and commenced by the appellant. Nor, so far as I understand, have noble and learned Lords had any hesitation in coming to the conclusion, with the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, that there is no existing rule of public policy which can be effectively pleaded in bar of the injunction. For my own part I am very clearly of opinion that no violence is done to the canon laid down by the common law courts in affirming that a restraint which is absolutely necessary in order to protect a transaction which the law permits in the interest of the public ought to be regarded as reasonable, and cannot in deference to political ideas which are now obsolete, be regarded as in contravention of public policy. Were it necessary I should be prepared to affirm that, in the year 1888 there was not, and there does not now exist, any imperial rule of policy which requires that a restraint, having that effect only, shall be treated as a nullity because it is unlimited in space in circumstances such as occur in the present case. I venture to doubt whether it be now, or ever has been, an essential part of the policy of England to encourage unfettered competition in the sale of arms of precision to tribes who may become her antagonists in warfare. I also doubt whether, at any period of time, an English court would have allowed a foreigner to break his contract with an English subject in order to foster such competition. C

When the series of cases from the earliest to the present time are carefully considered, I think they will be found to record the history of a protracted struggle between the principle of common honesty in private transactions, on the one hand, and the stern rule which forbade all restraints of trade, on the other. In my opinion, it does not admit of dispute that the ancient rule has had the worst of the encounter, and has been gradually losing ground in all the courts. I do not think that between the courts of common law and equity there has been much, if any, real difference of opinion. But I am bound to say that the language used by equity judges is on the whole more in consonance with the commercial policy of the country than some of the favourite dicta of the common law courts. I purposely say some of those dicta, because I find in the opinions of many common law judges of the highest eminence, a clear and liberal recognition of the wider views of policy, which I suspect have influenced your Lordships in the decision of this appeal. F
H

The lords justices were agreed, and I understand that your Lordships are also agreed, as to the result of this case. A controversy has arisen as to the principle upon which that result ought to be reached. To my mind, it is not a matter of practical importance whether the admission of a restraint, unlimited in space, be regarded as a novel exception from the general rule which forbids all restraints, or as an extension of the exception upon that rule which has admitted limited restraints. I have no desire to interfere with anybody's freedom of choice between these alternatives. I am content to state that, in my opinion, the judgment which your Lordships are about to pronounce goes no farther than to adopt to new circumstances an old and sound exception to the general rule. I

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I concur in the judgment moved by the Lord Chancellor. The sole question is whether the covenant referred to is void, or whether it is

A capable of being enforced against the appellant. I think it is quite clear that the covenant must be taken as entered into in connection with the sale of the goodwill of the appellant's business, and that it was entered into with the plain and bona fide object of protecting that business.

The appellant has argued that he is not bound by the covenant, and that it is void, as being opposed to public policy, and, being general, unrestricted as to area.

B The cases that have been referred to are interesting and important as showing the history, growth, and development of an important branch of our law. In considering them it is necessary to bear in mind the vast advances that have since the reign of Queen Elizabeth taken place in science, inventions, political institutions, commerce, and the intercourse of nations. Telegraphs, postal systems, railways, steam, have brought all parts of the world into touch. Communication has become easy,

C rapid, and cheap. Commerce has grown with our growth, and trade is ever finding new outlets and methods that cannot be circumscribed by areas, or narrowed by the municipal laws of any country. It is not surprising to note that our laws have been also expanded, and that legal principles have been applied and developed so as to suit the exigencies of the age in which we live. The appellant practically seeks to ignore the altered conditions of today, and to rely upon a rigid application

D of what he conceives to be the meaning of some decisions given in other generations, and this without taking note of the facts of the cases, or of the conditions of the time when they occurred. His argument practically is, that his covenant is in general restraint of trade, and that, if it be so, regardless of whether it is reasonable, whether it only affords a fair protection to his covenantees, it must be held to be void. In the early times all agreements in restraint of trade were dis-

E countenanced; but by degrees, as the exigencies of an advancing civilisation demanded, this was found to be too rigid, and our judges considered in each case what was reasonable and necessary to afford fair protection.

This is apparent in the important judgment of LORD MACCLESFIELD [then PARKER, C.J.] in Mitchel v. Reynolds (1). That was the case of a partial restraint of trade, and the judgment referred to the great distinction between a covenant in general

F restraint of trade and such a covenant as he was then dealing with. According to the then state of English life it would be hard to conceive that a covenant in general restraint of trade could ever be reasonable, and no imagination could then conceive that it could ever be needed for the fair protection of anyone. It is easy to understand how a distinction for convenience came to be thus expressly noted between general and partial restraints of trade. TINDAL, C.J., in Horner v. Graves (3), points out in reference to this judgment of LORD MACCLESFIELD (7 Bing. at p. 743):

"PARKER, C.J., says 'a restraint to carry on a trade throughout the kingdom must be void; a restraint to carry it on within a particular place is good,' which are rather instances and examples than limits of the application of the rule, which can only be at last, what is a reasonable restraint with reference to a particular case."

H

Reference to this judgment of LORD MACCLESFIELD, and to this distinction between covenants in general and partial restraint of trade, is found naturally in numerous cases. It appeared to afford a convenient nomenclature, and to be probably suited for some cases, but I respectfully concur with TINDAL, C.J., in the words already

I quoted, that the covenants were not

"limits of the application of the rule, which can only be at last, what is a reasonable restraint with reference to a particular case."

I do not know that there is a single reported case whose facts are clearly known, where a covenant in general restraint of trade clearly reasonable in itself, and only affording a fair protection to the parties, has been held to be void. One can readily see that such covenants might be extravagant and unnecessary, quite unreasonable, and not at all required for fair protection, and then the fact that they were general and not partial would be a distinction entitled to great weight. Thus I can well understand the existence of the distinction being kept alive and noted in so many cases, though this would not at all imply or require that the reasonableness of a covenant and the fact that it only afforded fair protection should ever be put aside or ignored. In former days the arguments used showed how different were the circumstances of those times. Discussions are to be found as to ten-mile limits, and fifty miles, and as to the distances of one English town from another—then considerable topics; but now often trivial having regard to present means of locomotion. A

The cases show a great variety of circumstances—different professions and trades—cases of apprenticeship, and sales of goodwill. Each case has had to be considered on its own facts. It is really impossible to divide all cases into the two categories of covenants in general and partial restraint of trade requiring distinct treatment, and needing different policies. However it is accomplished, the law must work in harmony with the requirements of the times, and must advance and develop with the growth of our national life and institutions. Whether there ever was an effective and acknowledged rule, requiring all covenants in restraint of trade to be divided into two broad categories of general or partial restraint with the test of reasonableness openly and expressly applied to partial restraints, while it was ostensibly denied to general restraints though in reality applied under the guise of an exception whenever the exigencies of life and business required it; or whether, assuming the rule to have been once known and recognised, it can now be accepted as applicable to the conditions of our present life; or whether all restraints upon trade have been always really governed by the one test: What is a fair protection and what is reasonable?, are inquiries of interest on which legal minds may differ. I do not regard the distinction as of any practical importance, because as in the present case the inquiry as to the validity of all covenants in respect of trade must, I am disposed to think, now ultimately turn upon whether they are reasonable, and whether they exceed what is necessary for the fair protection of the covenantees. There may be differences of opinion as to the history of covenants in restraint of trade, as to distinctions from time to time taken in nomenclature; but I believe in the result there is no real difference of opinion, and that all your Lordships hold the covenant in the present case to be good and valid for reasons which do not very seriously differ. C

I do not pursue the controversy suggested by BOWEN, L.J., as to the judgments of LORD LANGDALE, JAMES, V.-C., and SIR EDWARD FRY, in the three cases so often referred to, but, as will appear from what I have already said, I should find much difficulty in accepting all his criticisms, much as I respect his ability and research. LINDLEY, L.J., clearly in his judgment recognised the tendency of modern decisions, and said expressly that the opinion G

“that the only test by which to determine the validity or invalidity of a covenant in restraint of trade given for valuable consideration was its reasonableness for the protection of the trade or business of the covenantee [was] the doctrine to which the modern authorities have been gradually approximating.” H

Having regard to the facts of the present case, to the nature of the business, to the class and number of customers, I think the covenant reasonable, and not larger than the protection of the respondents required. I do not see anything to lead to the conclusion that the covenant is injurious to the public interest. I entirely agree with the Lord Chancellor in the propriety and prudence of not saying a word which would imply that such an important topic was ignored or lost sight of. I concur in the suggested judgment. I

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The appellant, Thorsten Nordenfelt, a Swedish gentleman, a person of much intelligence, as his able address to your Lordships proved, and of great skill in certain branches of mechanical science, had established in England and Sweden a valuable business in connection with the manufacture of

A quick-firing guns. His customers were comparatively few in number, but his trade was world-wide in extent. He had upon his books almost every monarch and almost every State of any note in the habitable globe. In 1886 Mr. Nordenfelt sold his business to a limited company, which was formed for the purpose of purchasing it. At the same time, and as part of the same transaction, he entered into a restrictive covenant with the purchasers intended to protect the business in their hands. In 1888 the purchasers transferred their business to the respondents, a limited company established with the object of combining the Nordenfelt business with a similar business founded by a Mr. Maxim. The transfer was made with the concurrence of Mr. Nordenfelt. Without his concurrence and co-operation it is plain that it would not have been made at all. On the occasion of the transfer, and as part of the arrangement, Mr. Nordenfelt entered into a restrictive covenant with the respondents. This covenant was in some respects wider, in others less wide, than the covenant with the original purchasers. But it was in lieu of, and in substitution for, that covenant, which, of course, would have been kept alive if Mr. Nordenfelt had declined to come into the new arrangement.

D In these circumstances I think that the Court of Appeal were right in regarding the covenant which Mr. Nordenfelt entered into with the respondents as a covenant made upon the occasion of the sale of his business, and as depending for its validity upon the principles and considerations applicable to such a case. The stipulation was that Mr. Nordenfelt should not, during the term of twenty-five years from the date of the incorporation of the company, if the company should so long continue to carry on business,

E "engage, except on behalf of the company, either directly or indirectly in the trade or business of a manufacturer of guns, gun-mountings, or carriages, gun-powder, explosives, or ammunition, or in any business competing or liable to compete in any way with that for the time being carried on by the company."

F A proviso was added to the effect that such restriction should not apply to explosives other than gunpowder, or to subaqueous or submarine boats, or torpedoes, or castings or forgings of steel or iron, or alloys of iron or of copper. The latter part of the covenant, which extends to all competing businesses, may be disregarded. In view of the manifold objects of the company, as set out in their memorandum of association, it was held by the Court of Appeal to be void; and there is no appeal from that part of the decision. The proviso also, I think, may be put aside. It is one of the circumstances to be taken into consideration as bearing upon the question of the reasonableness of the agreement; but it is not, I think, essential to the validity of this covenant.

G Mr. Nordenfelt admittedly has broken the earlier part of the covenant. His contention is that the whole covenant is void in law as being a covenant in restraint of trade—unlimited in space. And the only point which your Lordships have to decide is whether that part of the covenant which the appellant has broken is valid. For H it cannot be disputed that the covenant is severable, and that part may be good though part may be void. The learned judges of the Court of Appeal have come to the conclusion that the earlier part of the covenant is valid. But though they all arrive at one and the same result, they approach the question from somewhat different points of view. LINDLEY, L.J., expressed his opinion that the doctrine

I "that the only test by which to determine the validity or invalidity of a covenant in restraint of trade given for valuable consideration was its reasonableness for the protection of the trade or business of the covenantee [was] the doctrine to which the modern authorities have been gradually approximating."

But he could not, he said, "regard it as finally settled, nor indeed as quite correct." He thought it ignored

"the law which forbids monopolies, and prevents a person from unrestrictedly binding himself not to earn his living in the best way he can."

In the particular circumstances of the present case he considered that the earlier part of the covenant was not contrary to public policy. Apart from public policy, he thought it reasonable, not being wider than was "reasonably necessary for the protection of the interests of the covenantee." BOWEN, L.J., considered that it was the established common law doctrine—a rule to be gathered from the books "with perfect ease," though certain equity judges had ignored the rule, or misunderstood the law—that in the case of contracts in general restraint of trade the courts had nothing to do with the reasonableness of the transaction. That was an inquiry which appertained only to partial restraints. Contracts in general restraint of trade he defined as "those by which a person restrains himself from all exercise of his trade in any part of England." He added:

"Scores of cases have proceeded on this basis, and those who dispute the rule can only do so, as it seems to me, by disregarding the judgments and opinions of an uncounted number of unanimous common law judges."

But then he thought that the rule, being a rule based on reason and policy, might admit of exceptions, and, treating the present case as an exception, he, too, thought the agreement limited to the first part of the covenant reasonable in itself, and not contrary to public policy. A. L. SMITH, L.J., came to the same conclusion, thinking that there was no hard and fast rule "that every covenant in restraint of trade is ipso facto void if it is unlimited as to space," and being apparently of opinion that the restraint in the present case, though unlimited in space, might yet be regarded as partial owing to the circumstance that certain trades or branches of trade in which the appellant had been engaged were reserved to him by the proviso attached to the covenant.

No doubt it is one thing to say that all exceptions to the general rule that the policy of the law is against restraints of trade are referable to one and the same principle, and that the only true test is: What is a reasonable restraint in the particular case. It is another thing to say that restraints of trade are divisible into two distinct categories—partial restraints, and general restraints—that reasonableness is a test applicable to partial restraints and inapplicable to general restraints, but that the rule admits of exceptions, and that when you have found an exceptional case, you may apply to it the very same test which is applicable to partial restraints. There is a distinction certainly; but whether there is a substantial difference, it is perhaps unnecessary to inquire. Assuming the rule to be that general restraints are void as being contrary to public policy and not on any other ground, an exception must surely arise, if exceptions are admissible at all, as soon as you find that the particular case under consideration is not contrary to public policy, and so not opposed to the principle on which the rule is founded.

Thinking, as I do, that the distinction, if it exists, is of no practical importance, I should have been content with expressing my concurrence in the result at which the Court of Appeal has arrived if it had not been for certain passages in the very able and elaborate judgment of BOWEN, L.J., from which I respectfully dissent. Having laid down what he considered to be the common law rule, BOWEN, L.J., proceeds to observe that a decision to which he applies the word "inexplicable." BOWEN, L.J., says:

"the first cloud upon the clear sky of the common law narrative comes in the equity decision of LORD LANGDALE, M.R., in Whittaker v. Howe (6), in 1841,"

"Everything appears clear in the case except the judgment of the court. The covenant was not a covenant in partial, but in general restraint of trade; and the restraint of trade being a general one, the court had nothing to do with the reasonableness of the transaction; LORD LANGDALE, nevertheless, begins by stating that the question was whether the restraint intended to be imposed upon the defendant was reasonable; and he cites as a guide for himself the words of TINDAL, C.J., in Horner v. Graves (3)."

A After pointing out that Horner v. Graves (3) was a case of limited restraint, BOWEN, L.J., adds:

"LORD LANGDALE thus appears to miss the whole point of the common law classification, and treats the matter before him in the wrong category."

B Dealing with the judgment of JAMES, V.-C., in Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorrison (8), BOWEN, L.J., says that his "language seems calculated in several passages to confuse, and not to throw light upon our conceptions of the established common law doctrine." He observes:

"The Vice-Chancellor's expressions are at times coloured by the same kind of misapprehension of the common law as that which pervades the judgment of LORD LANGDALE in Whittaker v. Howe (6)."

C Observations of a similar kind are made in reference to the judgment of SIR EDWARD FRY, in Rousillon v. Rousillon (9).

This appears to me to be a very grave censure—graver, I think, than BOWEN, L.J., could have supposed or intended—because in such cases it was undoubtedly the duty of equity to follow the common law. The province of the court was to give effect to common law rights. If the covenant was void at common law, a court of equity would have erred grievously in attempting to enforce it by injunction. If the question had been doubtful it would have been the duty of the court, at least in the time of LORD LANGDALE, to leave the parties to their common law rights, or to take the opinion of a court of common law, as was done in Bunn v. Guy (10), and by LORD LANGDALE himself in Nicholls v. Stretton (11). Criticism so unsparing seems to invite or provoke inquiry. One cannot do otherwise than test the ground at each step.

E I have read, I think, every reported case upon the subject, and I must say, with the utmost deference to BOWEN, L.J.'s opinion, that I cannot help thinking that LORD LANGDALE, and JAMES, V.-C., and SIR EDWARD FRY, have rightly apprehended the common law doctrine as it may be traced in the books, and as it is expounded by some of the leading authorities on the subject in modern times. In the age of Queen Elizabeth all restraints of trade, whatever they were, general or partial, were thought to be contrary to public policy, and, therefore, void: Colgate v. Bachelier (12). In time, however, it was found that a rule so rigid and far-reaching must seriously interfere with transactions of everyday occurrence. Traders could hardly venture to let their shops out of their own hands; the purchaser of a business was at the mercy of the seller; every apprentice was a possible rival. So the rule was relaxed. It was relaxed as far as the exigencies of trade for the time being required, gradually and not without difficulty, until it came to be recognised that all partial restraints might be good, though it was thought that general restraints, that is, restraints extending throughout the kingdom must be bad. Why was the relaxation supposed to be thus limited? Simply because nobody imagined in those days that a general restraint could be reasonable, not because there was any interest or essential distinction between the two cases. LORD MACCLESFIELD, in Mitchel v. Reynolds (1), said (1 P.Wms. at p. 182):

"Where the restraint is general not to exercise a trade throughout the kingdom [the restraint] must be void, being of no benefit to either party, and very oppressive, as shall be shown by and by."

I Later on he gives his reason, when he says (ibid. at p. 191):

"What does it signify to a tradesman in London what another does at Newcastle; and surely it would be unreasonable to fix a certain loss on one side without any benefit to the other."

BEST, C.J., in Homer v. Ashford (13), says:

"Any deed by which a person binds himself not to employ his talents, his industry, or his capital, in any useful undertaking in the Kingdom, would be void, because no good reason could be imagined for any person's imposing such a restraint on himself." A

The true view at the present time, I think, is this. The public have an interest in every person's carrying on his trade freely; so has the individual. All interference with individual liberty of action in trading, and all restraints of trade of themselves, if there is nothing more, are contrary to public policy, and, therefore, void. That is the general rule. But there are exceptions. Restraints of trade and interference with individual liberty of action, may be justified by the special circumstances of a particular case. It is a sufficient justification, and indeed, it is the only justification, if the restriction is reasonable—reasonable, that is, in reference to the interest of the parties concerned and reasonable in reference to the interests of the public, so framed and so guarded as to afford adequate protection to the party in whose favour it is imposed, while at the same time it is in no way injurious to the public. That, I think, is the fair result of all the authorities. B C

But it is not to be supposed that that result was reached all at once. The law has changed much, even since Mitchel v. Reynolds (1). It has become simpler and broader too. It was laid down in Mitchel v. Reynolds (1) that the court was to see that the restriction was made upon a good and adequate consideration, so as to be a proper and useful contract. But in time it was found that the parties themselves were better judges of that matter than the court, and it was held to be sufficient if there was a legal consideration of value; though, of course, the quantum of consideration may enter into the question of the reasonableness of the contract. For a long time exceptions were very limited. As late as 1793 it was argued that a restriction which included a country town, and extended ten miles round it, was so wide as to be unreasonable: Davis v. Mason (7). It was said, and apparently said with truth, that up to that time restrictions had been confined to the limits of a parish, or to some short distance, as half a mile. But LORD KENYON, in his judgment, observed that he did not see that the limits in question were necessarily unreasonable. "Nor do I know," he added, "how to draw the line." D E

The doctrine that the area of restriction should correspond with the area within which protection is required is an old doctrine. But it used to be laid down that the correspondence must be exact, and that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to show that the restriction sought to be enforced was neither excessive nor contrary to public policy. The better opinion is that the court ought not to hold the contract void unless the defendant "made it plainly and obviously clear that the plaintiff's interest did not require the defendant's exclusion, or that the public interest would be sacrificed," if the proposed restraint were upheld: Tallis v. Tallis (14). To a certain extent different considerations must apply in cases of apprenticeship, and cases of that sort, on the one hand, and cases of a sale of a business or dissolution of partnership, on the other. A man is bound an apprentice because he wishes to learn a trade, and to practise it. A man may sell because he is getting too old for the strain and worry of business, or because he wishes for some other reason to retire from business altogether. Then there is obviously more freedom of contract between buyer and seller than between master and servant, or an employer and a person seeking employment. F G H

When the question is how far interference with the liberty of an individual in a particular trade offends against the interest of the public, there is not much difficulty in measuring the offence and coming to a judgment on the question. The difficulty is much greater when the question of public policy is considered at large, and without direct reference to the interests of the individual under restraint. It is a principle of law and of public policy that trading should be encouraged, and that trade should be free, but a fetter is placed on trade and trading is discouraged if a man who has built up a valuable business is not to be permitted to dispose of the fruits of his labours to the best advantage. It has been said that if the restraint be general, "the whole of the public is restrained," a phrase not, I think, particularly accurate, or perhaps, particularly intelligible. It has been said that I

A when a person is debarred from carrying on his trade within a certain limit of space he will carry it on elsewhere, and thus the public outside the area of restriction will gain an advantage which may be set off, as it were, against the disadvantage resulting to the public within the limited area.

That is, perhaps, a just observation in a case of apprenticeship, and cases of that sort. But it is, I think, rather a fanciful way of looking at the matter in the case of a sale of goodwill. Applied to that sort of case, it seems to me to be just one of those unrealities which tend to confuse this question. What has the public to hope in the way of future service from a man who sells his business, meaning to trade no more? Is it likely that he will begin the struggle of life again, working at his old trade or profession in some remote place where he has no interest and no connections? Is the possibility that he may do so a factor to be taken into consideration? Nowadays, when all trades and businesses are open to everybody alike, it is not very easy to appreciate the injury to the public resulting from the withdrawal of one individual. When LORD KENYON was pressed with an argument as to the injury to the public in Thetford that would result from denying them the services of a particular surgeon, he answered that the public were not likely to be injured by an agreement of this kind. "Every other person," he added, "is at liberty to practise as a surgeon in this town": Davis v. Mason (7).

B I cannot help thinking that there is a good deal of common sense in the way in which LORD CAMPBELL looked at this question. A retired partner in the canvassing trade of a publishing business being under a restrictive covenant, claimed the right to disseminate his publications within the area of restriction. He appealed to public policy. LORD CAMPBELL said (Tallis v. Tallis (14), 1 E. & B. at p. 413):

"It is clear there would be evil if the law justified such a breach of contract; but it is by no means clear there would be any compensating good to the public from the publications intended by the defendant to be so made in violation of his promise to the plaintiff."

F That, of course, is not decisive in itself. It is an element for consideration of more or less weight according to circumstances. But LORD CAMPBELL's observation seems to bring into contrast two principles which have to be adjusted in all these cases; freedom of trade, and freedom of contract. SIR EDWARD FRY's view was that the cases in which an unlimited prohibition has been spoken of as void relate only to circumstances in which such a prohibition has been unreasonable. BOWEN, L.J., cites this passage, and meets it with the following question:

G "Is it not a truer view that the courts have never, as a rule, even entered on the consideration of the circumstances of any particular case where the prohibition has been unlimited as to area?"

That question seems to go to the root of the matter. May I venture to put it to the proof? Since the date of Mitchel v. Reynolds (1) how many cases have there been in which a general prohibition has come before a court of common law for discussion or decision? So far as I can discover there are two, and two only—Ward v. Byrne (5) and Hinde v. Gray (4). In Hinde v. Gray (4) the point was disposed of during the argument, on the presiding judge observing that the particular covenant under consideration had been held invalid in Ward v. Byrne (5). That observation was repeated in the judgment, and nothing more was said. The covenant in question there was as little reasonable, though, perhaps, not quite so absurd, as the covenant in Ward v. Byrne (5). Hinde v. Gray (4), therefore, does not help one much.

I There remains Ward v. Byrne (5). In that case an unlimited restraint was imposed on a coal merchant's clerk; when once he left his master's employment he was not for nine months to earn his daily bread anywhere as a coal merchant, or a coal merchant's clerk, or in any capacity connected with the business of a coal merchant—an absurd and unreasonable stipulation if ever there was one. The only wonder is that when the case first came before the court on an argument as to the construction of the covenant, the vice of the contract passed unnoticed. Afterwards there was a motion in arrest of judgment on the ground that the covenant was void. How was that application dealt with? Did the court abstain from entering on the consideration of the particular circumstances? Why, the main if not the only ground of objection was the unreasonableness of such a restriction in the particular circumstances of the case. LORD ABINGER, C.B., observes (5 M. & W. at p. 560):

"This restriction extends to all parts of England, and to every species of engagement by which this person during that time could gain a livelihood by his trade. What protection could the plaintiff require to such an extent as this? Can it be supposed that the plaintiff's trade could be prejudiced by this man's entering into the service of a coal merchant in Scotland? The obligation which the defendant undertakes by his bond is, that he shall neither be nor serve a coal merchant in any capacity for nine months. That goes so far beyond what the plaintiff could require that it is an unreasonable restriction: it is void on both grounds. It is against the principles and policy of the law as to any restraints on trade, and the right of every man to be at liberty to struggle for his own existence in the exercise of any lawful employment; and it is beyond what is necessary for the protection of the plaintiff or what the justice of the case demands."

Nothing can be plainer than the view of the Chief Baron: all restraints of trade, if there is nothing more, are regarded with disfavour by the law; this restraint is unnecessary and unreasonable. The judgment of PARKE, B., is, I think, substantially to the same effect, but it is so important that I shall reserve it for separate consideration presently. GURNEY, B., followed the same line of argument. He asks (ibid. at p. 563):

"What is there in the trade of a coal merchant in London, whose interest could be injured by any person setting up as a coal merchant or assisting another person in that trade at Exeter or York?"

All these considerations, it will be observed, were wholly beside the point if there was in force a simple rule to the effect that the court has nothing whatever to do with the reasonableness of the transaction in the case of general restraints.

There is no higher authority upon this subject in modern times than TINDAL, C.J. He had more to do with moulding the law on this head, and bringing it into harmony with common sense than all the judges since LORD MACCLESFIELD's time put together. You will hardly find any judgment in reference to restraint of trade delivered by any court in England or America during the last sixty years, in which some passage is not cited from some judgment of TINDAL, C.J. In Horner v. Graves (3), TINDAL, C.J., delivered the considered judgment of the court. In the course of it he had occasion to refer to the passage in Mitchel v. Reynolds (1), which is supposed to be the origin, or at least the earliest embodiment of the doctrine, that a different principle applies to general restraints and partial restraints. He observes (7 Bing. at p. 748):

It is quite true that Horner v. Graves (3) was a case of partial restraint; but here we have TINDAL, C.J., dealing with the case of a general restraint as well as the case of a partial restraint. With both cases pointedly before him, and in reference to the one as well as to the other, he says that the only rule is: What is a reasonable restraint with reference to the particular case.

I do not find that this passage has ever been questioned, nor is there in the books so far as I can discover any authority conflicting with it, except the judgment of

- A BOWEN, L.J., in the present case. It may, perhaps, be objected that passages are to be found in the judgments of TINDAL, C.J., as well as in the judgment of other judges, in which it is said that general restraints are void without adverting to any reason for their invalidity. That, no doubt, is so, and, indeed, in this very judgment there is such a passage. But is it not fair to conclude that TINDAL, C.J., thought general restraints bad, not because there was an arbitrary law to that effect
- B —a hard and fast rule which judges had learned by rote, and the origin of which it was forbidden to explore, but because a general restraint was an example, a typical example if you will, of an unreasonable contract. It does not seem to me to affect the question in the very least how often the dictum may be found repeated, if, on the one hand, it is not accompanied by any reason or explanation, and, on the other, it appears without any authoritative statement that the proposition had
- C become a rule which was neither to be questioned nor explained. It is merely a dictum after all, because there is no reported case, except, perhaps, Ward v. Byrne (5), in which it could have had any bearing upon the decision. Certainly it is no wonder that judges of former times did not foresee that the discoveries of science, with their practical results, might in time prove general restraints in some cases to be perfectly reasonable. When that time came it was only a legitimate develop-
- D ment—it was hardly even an extension—of the principle on which exceptions were first allowed to admit unlimited restraints into the class of allowable exceptions to the general rule.

I would now turn to the judgment of PARKE, B., in Ward v. Byrne (5), which was decided in 1839, eight years after the decision in Horner v. Graves (3). The learned judge begins by stating the circumstances of the case, and the leading principle

E laid down in Mitchel v. Reynolds (1), that the public have an interest in every person carrying on his trade freely. Then he cites as a guide for himself the words of TINDAL, C.J., in a case of limited restraint; the very thing for which LORD LANGDALE is so much blamed. He could not, he said, express the rule more clearly than it had been done by TINDAL, C.J., in Hitchcock v. Coker (15), where he says:

- F “We agree in the general principle adopted by the Court of Queen’s Bench, that where the restraint of a party from carrying on a trade is larger and wider than the protection of the party with which the contract is made can possibly require such restraint must be considered as unreasonable in law, and the contract which would enforce it must be therefore void.”

Oddly enough, that is a reproduction of the very passage which LORD LANGDALE selected as his guide; only he took it from Horner v. Graves (3) directly, while

G PARKE, B., took it from the judgment on appeal in Hitchcock v. Coker (15). There it is attributed to LORD DENMAN, who does no more than quote the passage which LORD LANGDALE cites from Horner v. Graves (3). Then PARKE, B., observes, and he repeats the observation more than once, that there is no authority in favour of the position that there can be a general restriction limited only as to time. He

H might, I think, have said with equal truth, that there was no case since Mitchel v. Reynolds (1), in which the question had come before the court for consideration. In conclusion, he says (5 M. & W. at pp. 562, 563):

“This case falls within the rule laid down by TINDAL, C.J., viz., that this is a general prohibition from carrying on trade which is more extensive than the interests of the party with whom the contract is made can possibly require.

- I On that ground I think the judgment ought to be arrested.”

What did PARKE, B., mean there by the rule laid down by TINDAL, C.J.? There is no rule to be found laid down by TINDAL, C.J., in those words or to that effect, except in the passage I have cited from Horner v. Graves (3). PARKE, B., may have been referring to Horner v. Graves (3), or he may have been referring to some opinion well known to him, though it is not to be found in any reported judgment. In either case that would be a strong confirmation of the argument I am endeavouring to present to your Lordships. But the argument seems to me to be irresistible if PARKE, B., thought that the rule as he expressed it, and as applied to a case of general prohibition, was fairly to be deduced from a similar rule laid down in a case of partial restraint. A

With regard to LORD LANGDALE's judgment in Whittaker v. Howe (6), I have some difficulty in understanding what the objection to it is, even on the view which BOWEN, L.J., takes in reference to partial and general restraints, unless his view was, as one passage in his judgment which has already been cited seems to indicate, that a restraint limited to England is to be considered as a general restraint nowadays, when England is only part of the United Kingdom as much as it was when the three kingdoms were separate. I cannot think that Whittaker v. Howe (6) requires much explanation. There is a homely proverb current in my part of the country which says you may not "sell the cow and sup the milk." That is just what Mr. Howe tried to do. He was a solicitor in large practice. He sold his business for a good round sum to two younger practitioners, and covenanted not to practise on his own account in England or Scotland. In order to hold the business together his name was kept in the firm, and he remained in the office drawing a handsome salary. Then there was a quarrel, and he carried off surreptitiously all the papers he could lay his hands on; he set up in the immediate neighbourhood; and he tried to steal the business he had sold. His defence was that a covenant so wide was against public policy. But it did not occur to him to return the price; that he kept in his pocket. B

LORD LANGDALE evidently thought the public would not greatly suffer if Mr. Howe withdrew for a time from the ranks of an honourable profession. I cannot think he was very wrong. It seems almost absurd to talk of public policy in connection with such a case. It is a public scandal when the law is forced to uphold a dishonest act. Would the public find suitable compensation in the privilege of employing an unprincipled lawyer practising in violation of his solemn engagement? And it must be borne in mind that the firm remained, though one member retired into private life. LORD LANGDALE thought on the evidence before him that the restraint was not unreasonable, although it extended to the whole of England and Scotland. Whether he was right or wrong in that view it is impossible to say without knowing what the evidence was. Undoubtedly some solicitors have correspondents in almost every business centre in the kingdom. At any rate that particular point does not seem to have been contested in the argument, and it lay on the defendant to prove the area of restriction unreasonable. I venture to think that the decision in Whittaker v. Howe (6) was right. Further, whether the restraint in that case ought to be regarded as general or as partial, I think the decision was in accord with the opinions of TINDAL, C.J., and PARKE, B. Nor can I, with all deference to PATTESON, J., understand how anybody could suppose that Whittaker v. Howe (6), in which the restraint was held to be reasonable, conflicts with Ward v. Byrne (5), where the restraint was plainly unreasonable and held to be so. E
G

In the present case it was hardly disputed that the restraint was reasonable, having regard to the interests of the parties at the time when the transaction was entered into. It enabled Mr. Nordenfelt to obtain the full value of what he had to sell; without it the purchasers could not have been protected in the possession of what they wished to buy. Was it reasonable in the interests of the public? It can hardly be injurious to the public, that is the British public, that a person is prevented from carrying on a trade in weapons of war abroad. But apart from that special feature in the present case, how can the public be injured by the transfer of a business from one hand to another? If a business is profitable there will be no lack of persons ready to carry it on. In this particular case the purchasers brought in fresh capital, and had at least the opportunity of retaining Mr. Nordenfelt's services. But then it was said there is another way in which the public may be injured. Mr. Nordenfelt has "committed industrial suicide," and as he can no longer earn his living at the trade which he has made peculiarly his own, he may be brought to want and become a burden to the public. This seems to me to be H very far fetched. Mr. Nordenfelt received over £200,000 for what he sold. He may have got rid of the money, I do not know how that is. But even so I would answer the argument in the words of TINDAL, C.J., in Rennie v. Irvine (16) (7 Man. & G. at pp. 976, 977):

“If the contract is a reasonable one at the time it is entered into, we are not bound to look out for improbable and extravagant contingencies in order to make it void.”

For the reasons which I have given, I think the only true test in all cases, whether of partial or general restraint, is the test proposed by TINDAL, C.J.: What is a reasonable restraint with reference to the particular case? I think that the restraint in the present case is reasonable in every point of view, and therefore, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD MORRIS.—I entirely concur in the judgment and the reasons for it given by the Lord Chancellor. But I desire to express my opinion that, without going through the numerous cases which have been so exhaustively dealt with in the Court of Appeal and by your Lordships, the weight of authority up to the present time is with the proposition that general restraints of trade were necessarily void. It appears, however, to me that the time for a new departure has arisen, and that it should be now authoritatively decided that there should be no difference in the legal considerations which would invalidate an agreement whether in general or partial restraint of trading. These considerations I consider are whether the restraint is reasonable and is not against the public interest. In olden times all restraints of trading were considered prima facie void. An exception was introduced when the agreement to restrain from trading was only from trading in a particular place and upon reasonable consideration, leaving still invalid agreements to restrain trading at all. Such a general restraint was in the then state of things considered to be of no benefit even to the covenantee himself, but we have now reached a period when it may be said that science and invention have almost annihilated both time and space. Consequently, there should no longer exist any cast-iron rule making void any agreement not to carry on a trade anywhere. The generality of time or space must always be a most important factor in the consideration of reasonableness though not per se a decisive test. If the consideration of reasonableness or of public interest is the rule the appellant, in my opinion, has no case. The portion of his business which consisted of manufacturing guns and gunpowder explosives, was one which would almost altogether be with governments, foreign as well as at home, and wherever carried on would necessarily be in injurious competition with the respondents, nor does the substitution of a company for the appellant in the manufacture of guns and ammunition appear to me to injuriously affect the public interest.

MAKIN v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR NEW SOUTH WALES

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Herschell, L.C., Lord Watson, Lord Halsbury, Lord Ashbourne, Lord Macnaghten, Lord Morris and Lord Shand), July 17, 18, 20, 21, December 12, 1893]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Evidence of similar offences—Relevance to issue before jury—Rebuttal of defence of accident or defence otherwise open to accused—Baby farming—Charge of murder of infant—Evidence of deaths of other infants.

It is undoubtedly not competent for the prosecution in a criminal case to adduce evidence tending to show that the accused has been guilty of criminal acts other than those covered by the indictment for the purpose of leading to the conclusion that the accused is a person likely from his criminal conduct or character to have committed the offence for which he is being tried. On the other hand, the mere fact that the evidence adduced tends to show the commission of other crimes does not render it inadmissible if it be relevant to an issue before the jury, and it may be so relevant if it bears upon the question whether the acts alleged to constitute the crime charged in the indictment were designed or accidental, or to rebut a defence which would otherwise be open to the accused.

On the trial of the appellants for the murder of an infant the mother of the child gave evidence that the appellants told her that, if she would pay them £3, they would adopt the child and bring it up as their own.

Held: it was relevant to the issue to be tried by the jury that several other infants had been received by the appellants from their mothers on like representations and on payment of a sum inadequate for the support of the child for more than a very limited period, and that the bodies of infants had been found buried in a manner similar to that in which the body of the child the subject of the charge had been found in the gardens of houses occupied by the appellants, and, therefore, evidence of those matters was rightly admitted at the trial.

Appeal by special leave from a decision of the Supreme Court of New South Wales affirming the convictions of the appellants, John Makin and Sarah Makin, husband and wife, for the murder of an infant, Horace Amber Murray, on their trial before STEPHEN, J., who stated a Case for the opinion of the Supreme Court.

D Fullarton, Q.C., and Cunningham for the appellants admitted that the child for the murder of which they were convicted was Murray's child, but contended that the evidence as to all the other cases was inadmissible.

E Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Poland, Q.C., Cluer and R. H. Long Innes for the respondent, argued that the evidence was admissible to negative the theory that the death was caused by accident.

Dec. 12, 1893. LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The appellants were tried and found Guilty at the Sydney Gaol Delivery held at Darlinghurst, of the murder of

F the infant child of one Amber Murray. The learned judge before whom the case was tried deferred passing sentence until after the argument of the Special Case, which he stated for the opinion of the Supreme Court of New South Wales. The points reserved by the learned judge were (i) whether he was wrong in admitting evidence of the finding of other bodies than the body of the child alleged to be Horace Amber Murray; (ii) whether he was wrong in admitting the evidence of

G Florence Risby, Mary Stacey, Agnes Todd, Agnes Ward, and Mrs. Sutherland; (iii) whether there was evidence to prove the identity of the body marked D. with that of Horace Amber Murray; (iv) whether there was evidence of the death or cause of death of Horace Amber Murray, or that he was murdered. The questions for the court were, whether the evidence objected to was admissible, and, if not: Were the prisoners rightly convicted? and, even if inadmissible: Was there evidence sufficient to sustain the conviction? On the argument of the Special Case the third point was abandoned by the learned counsel for the prisoners. On the other points the judgment was in favour of the Crown. Special leave was granted to appeal to this Board from the judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, some of the questions raised being of grave and general importance.

H There can be no doubt in their Lordships' opinion that there was ample evidence

I to go to the jury that the infant was murdered. Indeed that point was scarcely contested in the argument of the learned counsel for the appellants. The question which their Lordships had to determine was the admissibility of the evidence relating to the finding of other bodies and to the fact that other children had been entrusted to the appellants. In their Lordships' opinion the principles which must govern the decision of the case are clear, though the application of them is by no means free from difficulty. It is undoubtedly not competent for the prosecution to adduce evidence tending to show that the accused has been guilty of criminal acts other than those covered by the indictment for the purpose of leading to the conclusion that the accused is a person likely from his criminal conduct or character to have committed the offence for which he is being tried. On the other hand, the mere fact that the evidence adduced tends to show the commission of other crimes does not render it inadmissible if it be relevant to an issue before the jury, and it may be so relevant if it bears upon the question whether the acts alleged to constitute the crime charged in the indictment were designed or accidental, or to rebut a defence which would otherwise be open to the accused. The statement of these general principles is easy, but it is obvious that it may often be very difficult to draw the line and to decide whether a particular piece of evidence is on the one side or the other.

The principles which their Lordships have indicated appear to be on the whole consistent with the current of authority bearing on the point, though it cannot be denied that the decisions have not always been completely in accord. The leading authority relied on by the Crown was R. v. Geering (1) where on the trial of a prisoner for the murder of her husband by administering arsenic evidence was tendered, with the view of showing that the two sons of the prisoner who had formed part of the same family, and for whom the prisoner had cooked food as well as for her husband, had died of poison, the symptoms in all these cases being the same. The evidence was admitted by POLLOCK, C.B., who tried the case; he held that it was admissible, inasmuch as its tendency was to prove that the death of the husband was occasioned by arsenic, and was relevant to the question whether such taking was accidental or not. The Chief Baron refused to reserve the point for the consideration of the judges, intimating that ALDERSON, B., and TALFOURD, J., concurred with him in his opinion. This authority has been followed in several subsequent cases.

In R. v. Dossett (2), which was tried a few years previously, the same view was acted upon by MAULE, J., on a trial for arson, where it appeared that a rick of wheat-straw was set on fire by the prisoner having fired a gun near to it. Evidence was admitted to show that the rick had been on fire the previous day and that the prisoner was then close to it with a gun in his hand. MAULE, J., said:

"Although the evidence offered may be proof of another felony, that circumstance does not render it inadmissible, if the evidence be otherwise receivable. In many cases it is an important question whether a thing was done accidentally or wilfully."

The only subsequent case to which their Lordships think it necessary to refer specifically is that of R. v. Gray (3), where, on a trial for arson with intent to defraud an insurance company, WILLES, J., admitted evidence that the prisoner had made claims on two other insurance companies in respect of fires which had occurred in two other houses which he had occupied previously and in succession, for the purpose of showing that the fire which formed the subject of the trial was the result of design and not of accident. The learned judge, after consulting MARTIN, B., refused to reserve the point for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved. The fact that the learned judge took this course after consulting MARTIN, B., is important, because a decision of that learned judge was mainly relied on in opposition to the authorities to which attention has been drawn. The case referred to is that of R. v. Winslow (4), which it certainly seems difficult to reconcile with R. v. Geering (1); but, in view of the circumstance to which attention has been called, it cannot be regarded as certain that MARTIN, B., deliberately dissented from the view which was adopted in R. v. Geering (1) and other cases.

The learned counsel for the appellants placed much reliance on R. v. Oddy (5), the only one which has been considered by the Court for Crown Cases Reserved. It was there held that on the trial of an indictment containing counts for stealing, and for receiving the property knowing it to be stolen evidence of the possession by the prisoner of other property stolen some time before from other persons was not admissible upon the count for receiving with guilty knowledge, in respect of

A which alone it had been admitted by the recorder. LORD CAMPBELL said that, in his opinion, there was no more ground for admitting the evidence under the third count (for receiving) than under the first or second (for stealing). Under the two latter, it would have been evidence of the prisoner being a bad man, and likely to commit the offence there charged. So under the third count the evidence would only show the prisoner to be a bad man; it would not be direct evidence of the particular fact in issue. B ALDERSON, B., in his judgment said that the evidence merely went to show that the prisoner was in possession of other property which had been stolen in the previous December, and not that he had received such property knowing it to be stolen; that the mere possession of stolen property was evidence prima facie, not of receiving, but of stealing, and to admit such evidence in the case before him would be to allow a prosecutor, in order to make out that a prisoner had received C property with a guilty knowledge which had been stolen in March, to show that the prisoner had in the December previously stolen some other property from another place, and belonging to other persons. In other words, they were asked to say that, in order to show that the prisoner had committed one felony, the prosecutor might prove that he committed a totally different felony some time before. Their Lordships do not think that the judgments in R. v. Oddy (5) at all conflict with the D judgments in R. v. Geering (1) and the other cases referred to.

Their Lordships do not think it necessary to enter upon a detailed examination of the evidence in the present case. The prisoners had alleged that they had received only one child to nurse; that they had received 10s. a week while it was under their care, and that after a few weeks it was given back to the parents. When the infant with whose murder the appellants were charged was received from the E mother she stated that she had a child for them to adopt. Mrs. Makin said that she would take the child, and Makin said that they would bring it up as their own and educate it, and that he would take it because Mrs. Makin had lost a child of her own two years old. Makin said that he did not want any clothing; they had plenty of their own. The mother said that she did not mind his getting £3 premium so long as he took care of the child. The representation was that the prisoners were F willing to take the child on payment of the small sum of £3, inasmuch as they desired to adopt it as their own. Under these circumstances their Lordships cannot see that it was irrelevant to the issue to be tried by the jury that several other infants had been received from their mothers on like representations, and upon payment of a sum inadequate for the support of the child for more than a very limited period, or that the bodies of infants had been found buried in a similar G manner in the gardens of several houses occupied by the prisoners.

INCOME TAX SPECIAL PURPOSES COMMISSIONERS v. PEMSEL

[Reported [1891] A.C. 531; 61 L.J.Q.B. 265; 65 L.T. 621;
55 J.P. 805; 7 T.L.R. 657; 3 Tax Cas. 53]

"Charity" in its legal sense comprises four principal divisions: trusts for the relief of poverty; trusts for the advancement of education; trusts for the advancement of religion; and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community: per LORD MACNAGHTEN.

By indentures executed in 1813 and 1815 a settlor settled real estate in England on trust to apply the income "for the general purposes of maintaining, supporting, and advancing the missionary establishments among heathen nations of the Protestant Episcopal Church known by the name of Unitas Fratrum or United Brethren," commonly known as Moravians.

Held (LORD HALSBURY, L.C., and LORD BRAMWELL dissenting): the words "charitable purposes" in the Income Tax Act, 1842, s. 61, Sched. A, No. VI [now the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 447 (1) (a)], must be construed in their technical meaning according to English law, and, therefore, they were not to be construed as being confined to the relief of poverty; the purposes of the trusts in question were charitable purposes within the provision in the Act of 1842; and the rents and profits of the trust property were exempt from tax under Sched. A.

Statute—Construction—Statute applying to England and another country—Taxing Act—Construction to make operation of statute and incidence of taxation alike in each country—Repetition in later statute after practice in application of Act established—Assumption that legislature makes no mistakes—Contemporanea expositio—Words to be given legal meaning.

Where a statute applies to both England and another country, e.g., Scotland, that construction should, if possible, be adopted which makes the operation and effect of the statute the same in both countries. This is more particularly so in the case of taxing Acts which it is desirable should be construed so as to make the incidence of taxation alike in each country.

Per LORD HALSBURY, L.C.: I cannot agree that the construction of the statute (the Income Tax Act, 1842) can be affected by the course which has been followed by the executive officers of the Crown in the Inland Revenue Department. But, per LORD MACNAGHTEN: Where you find legislation following a continuous practice and repeating the very words on which that practice was founded, it may, perhaps, fairly be inferred that the legislature, in re-enacting the statute, used those words in their received meaning. And, perhaps, it might be argued that the inference grows stronger with every successive re-enactment.

Per LORD HALSBURY, L.C.: A court of law, in construing a statute, is bound to proceed on the assumption that the legislature is an ideal person that does not make mistakes.

Per LORD HALSBURY, L.C.: In construing a statute it would be impossible to give an adequate exposition of what would presumably be in the mind of the legislature without regarding the circumstances of the time and the state of public feeling when the legislation in question was under debate.

Per LORD MACNAGHTEN: In construing an Act of Parliament it is a general

A rule that words must be taken in their legal sense unless a contrary intention appears.

Notes. The Income Tax Act, 1842, was repealed by the Income Tax Act, 1918. The provisions relating to the exemption of charities from taxation are now to be found in ss. 447 and 448 of the Income Tax Act, 1952. Section 447 (1) (a) exempts from the taxes therein mentioned "tax chargeable . . . in respect of the rents and profits of any lands . . . vested in trustees for charitable purposes, so far as the same are applied to charitable purposes only," thus repeating the wording of the Act of 1842 considered by the House in the present case.

Appeal by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., FRY and LOPES, L.J.J.), reported 22 Q.B.D. 296, reversing a decision of the Divisional Court (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., GRANTHAM, J., dissenting).

The following statement of the facts is taken from the opinion of LORD WATSON. By indentures executed in 1813 and 1815, Mrs. Mary Elizabeth Bates settled real estate in England upon trust for purposes connected with the church of the United Brethren, commonly known as Moravians. The larger share of the trust income is appropriated to the support of the missionary establishment of the church among heathen nations. The other objects of the trust are (i) the maintenance and the education of children of ministers and missionaries, special regard being had to the children of those ministers who are least able to bear the expense, and (ii) the "choir houses" of the church, which provide homes for female teachers who have become incapacitated for work, for widows of ministers, missionaries, and poor members, and also for single men engaged in attending to the young and assisting in their education. G H

Down to the year 1886, income tax upon the annual value of the trust estate was paid in the first instance by their tenants, and was then repaid to the trustees, under the enactments of Sched. A, r. VI, of the Income Tax Act, 1842, which provides that, in charging duty, allowances shall be granted in respect of I

"the rents and profits of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, or heritages belonging to any hospital, public school, or almshouse, or vested in trustees for charitable purposes, so far as the same are applied for charitable purposes."

An application made to the appellants for allowance of the tax for the year ending April 5, 1886, which had been paid by the tenants, was rejected upon the ground

A that the purposes to which the trust income is appropriated and applied do not bring it within the scope of these exemptions. In consequence of their refusal, the respondent, who is treasurer of the Church of the United Brethren, upon April 12, 1888, obtained an order nisi for a writ of mandamus to compel the appellants to grant the allowance, and, with that view, to give a certificate with an order for repayment in the terms of the statute. It does not seem to admit of serious dispute B that, if the purposes of Mrs. Bates' trust are "charitable purposes" within the meaning of the Act of 1842, the appellants have declined to perform their statutory duty, and a mandamus must issue.

Had the Income Tax Act, 1842, been only an English statute the present controversy would, in all probability, never have arisen. The expression "charitable purposes" is commonly, if not invariably, used, both in English law and English C legislation, in a sense wide enough to include the missionary enterprises and the choir houses of the Unitas Fratrum, as well as the maintenance and education of the children of its ministers and missionaries. But the Act applies to Scotland as well as to England; and the argument of the appellants in the courts below, and at your Lordships' Bar, has been founded on the assumption that in Scottish law the expression cannot, according to any legitimate construction, include the objects D of Mrs. Bates' trust settlements. That proposition is not without some authority to support it, and hence the difficulty which the courts below have experienced in dealing with the present case.

The statutory words of exemption upon which the result of this appeal depends were, for the first time, made the subject of judicial interpretation in Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate (1), which was decided by the First Division of the E Court of Session in 1888. The testator in that case had directed that the funds settled by him, amounting to half a million sterling, should be expended for the support of objects and purposes in connection with the Established Church of Scotland, all of a religious character and for the aid of institutions having the promotion of such purposes in view, his desire being to mitigate spiritual destitution among the poor and working population of Scotland, through efforts for securing the godly upbringing of the young, the establishing of parochial pastoral work, F and the stimulating of ministers and agencies of the church to sustained devotion in the work of carrying the Gospel to the homes and hearts of all. The Inner House, affirming the judgment of the Lord Ordinary (LORD FRASER), held that the income of heritable estate vested in the trustees for these purposes was not within the statutory exemption. The learned judges of the Court of Session refused to attach to "charitable purposes" the comprehensive meaning which the words G admittedly bear in English law, being of opinion that they have no technical significance in the law language of Scotland. Accordingly, they held that in the Act of 1842, which is an Imperial statute, the words must be read in their ordinary and popular acceptance. The meaning of the words, when interpreted in that sense, was thus defined by the Lord President (LORD INGLIS):

H "Charity is relief of poverty, and a charitable act or a charitable purpose consists in relieving poverty, and whatever goes beyond that is not within the meaning of the word 'charity' as it occurs in this statute."

LORD SHAND, adopting a still narrower definition, said:

I "I think it [the statutory exemption] relates to funds dedicated to the relief of physical necessity or want; to funds given as alms, or as a provision for the relief of poor persons from physical privations, or suffering arising from poverty, and that it goes no farther."

LORD ADAM, in agreeing with his brethren, observed:

"It appears to me to be quite impossible to extend the term 'charitable purposes,' used in this Act, so as to cover religious purposes."

In the present case LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., adopted the same construction of "charitable purposes" which had commended itself to the Court of Session.

GRANTHAM, J., dissented, upon the ground apparently that the government by which the Act was introduced, and its successors in office, had, for more than forty years, invariably construed the words in the sense of English law, and allowed the exemptions which are now in dispute. In these circumstances the opinion of the senior judge prevailed, and the order nisi of April 12, 1888, was discharged by the Divisional Court; but in the Court of Appeal that judgment was unanimously reversed, and it was decreed that a peremptory mandamus should issue to the effect specified in the respondent's original application. LORD ESHER, M.R., and LOPES, L.J., recognised the authority of Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate (1) as settling that, in Scotland, the term "charitable purposes" has not the meaning which is attributed to it by English courts. They, therefore, discarded that meaning; but in determining what, in a popular sense, constitutes a "charitable purpose," they adopted a much more liberal definition than the learned judges of the Court of Session. They held that, in its ordinary acceptation, "charity" comprehends all benefits, whether religious, intellectual, or physical, bestowed upon persons who, by reason of their poverty, are unable to obtain such benefits for themselves without assistance. FRY, L.J., did not accept the authority of the decision in Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate (1), and came to the conclusion that the words "trusts for charitable purposes" have, for all practical purposes, the same legal significance in Scotland as in England or Ireland.

July 20, 1891. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case the Income Tax Commissioners have appealed against an order of the Court of Appeal, whereby a peremptory mandamus was awarded against them, commanding them to make an allowance and to grant a certificate of such allowance. If upon the merits of this case an allowance ought to be made, and a certificate granted, I cannot doubt that the order of the Court of Appeal was right. The statute under which the commissioners are acting is peremptory in its terms to the commissioners to make the allowance, and to give the certificates in cases where they are commanded to be given. If, therefore, the case is made out that the facts show a case where the allowance ought to be made, and the certificate, which is merely consequential, should be given, there is a plain duty imposed by the statute on these executive officers, the neglect of which is properly enforceable by mandamus. But the far more difficult question remains, whether the facts proved here establish the proposition that the case for the allowance is made out. That depends upon the true construction of the Income Tax Act, 1842, s. 61, No. VI, Sched. A, which is in these words:

"No. VI. Allowances to be made in respect of the said duties in Sched. A. For the duties charged on any college or hall in any of the universities of Great Britain in respect of the public buildings and offices belonging to such college or hall, and not occupied by any individual member thereof, or by any person paying rent for the same, and for the repairs of the public buildings and offices of such college or hall, and the gardens, walks, and grounds for recreation repaired and maintained by the funds of such college or hall. . . . Or on any hospital, public school, or almshouse, in respect of the public buildings, offices, and premises belonging to such hospital, public school, or almshouse, and not occupied by any individual officer or the master thereof, whose whole income, however arising, estimated according to the rules and directions of this Act, shall amount to or exceed £150 per annum, or by any person paying rent for the same, and for the repairs of such hospital, public school, or almshouse, and offices belonging thereto, and of the gardens, walks, and grounds for the sustenance or recreation of the hospitallers, scholars, and almsmen, repaired and main-

- A tained by the funds of such hospital, school, or almshouse, or on any building the property of any literary or scientific institution used solely for the purposes of such institution, and in which no payment is made or demanded for any instruction there afforded, by lectures or otherwise; provided also that the said building be not occupied by any officer of such institution, nor by any person paying rent for the same. . . . The said allowances to be granted by the commissioners for general purposes in their respective districts. . . . Or on the rents and profits of lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages belonging to any hospital, public school, or almshouse, or vested in trustees for charitable purposes so far as the same are applied to charitable purposes. . . . The said last-mentioned allowances to be granted upon proof before the commissioners for special purposes of the due application of the said rents and profits to charitable purposes only, and in so far as the same shall be applied to charitable purposes only. . . . The said last-mentioned allowances to be claimed and proved by any steward, agent, or factor, acting for such school, hospital, or almshouse, or other trust for charitable purposes, or by any trustee of the same, by affidavit to be taken before any commissioner for executing this Act in the district where such person shall reside, stating the amount of the duties chargeable, and the application thereof, and to be carried into effect by the commissioners for special purposes, and, according to the powers vested in such commissioners, without vacating, altering, or impeaching the assessments on or in respect of such properties; which assessments shall be in force and levied notwithstanding such allowances."
- E The main debate turns upon whether the lands here are vested in trustees for charitable purposes, though the whole enactment is not without its importance in considering what is the extent of its application. The particular dispositions which gave rise to the dispute are as follows. Under an indenture, dated Feb. 11, 1813: "Certain lands, tenements, and hereditaments (hereinafter referred to as lands) in the county of Middlesex" are conveyed by one Elizabeth Mary Bates to certain trustees
- F "upon trust, after payment of costs and outgoings, to apply the annuities, rent-charges, yearly issues, and profits (all of which are hereinafter referred to as rents and profits) of the said lands as follows:—that is to say: (1) As to two equal fourth parts thereof for the general purposes of maintaining, supporting, and advancing the missionary establishments among heathen nations of the Protestant Episcopal Church, known by the name of Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren (which Protestant Episcopal Church is hereinafter referred to as the said Church). (2) As to another equal fourth part towards the maintenance, support, and education of the children of ministers and missionaries educated at the school and academy at Fulner, near Leeds, special regard being had to the children of such ministers as are least able to support the expense of their children's education, or for the benefit and purposes of any similar school, academy, or establishment elsewhere within the United Kingdom. (3) As to the remaining equal fourth part or residue for the maintenance and support of certain establishments appertaining to the said Church, for single persons, called choir-houses, within the United Kingdom."
- I Under another indenture, dated July 25, 1815, certain freehold estates (also thereinafter referred to as lands) in the county of Middlesex are conveyed by the said Elizabeth Mary Bates to certain trustees
- "upon trust, after the payment of costs and outgoings, to apply the residue or surplus of the rents and profits of the said lands for the benefit and general purposes of a certain settlement or establishment of the said Church, existing at Gracehill, Ballymena, in the county of Antrim, and the dependencies of the said settlement or establishment as long as the same shall exist as a Congregational settlement of the said Church."

Whether these dispositions, or any of them, are charitable purposes, within the meaning of the exemption I have quoted above, must be determined upon a consideration of what those words "charitable purposes" mean in the exemption in question. Before proceeding to discuss the words themselves, I somewhat protest against the assumption that the alternative is to be between a popular and what is called a technical meaning, unless the word "technical" itself receives a construction different from that which is its ordinary use. There are, doubtless, some words to which the law had attached in the stricter sense a technical meaning; but the word "charitable" is not one of those words, though I do not deny that the old Court of Chancery, in enforcing the performance of charitable trusts, included in that phrase a number of subjects which undoubtedly no one outside the Court of Chancery would have supposed to be comprehended within that term. The alternative, therefore, to my mind, may be more accurately stated as lying between the popular and ordinary interpretation of the word "charitable" and the interpretation given by the Court of Chancery to the use of those words in the statute of 43 Eliz., c. 4 [Charitable Gifts Act, 1601].

To quote from the language of TINDAL, C.J., when delivering the opinion of the judges in the Sussex Peerage Case (2) (11 Cl. & Fin. at p. 115):

"The only rule for the construction of Acts of Parliament is, that they should be construed according to the intent of the Parliament which passed the Act. If the words of the statute are in themselves precise and unambiguous, then no more can be necessary than to expound those words in their natural and ordinary sense. The words themselves alone do in such case best declare the intention of the lawgiver. But if any doubt arises from the terms employed by the legislature, it has always been held a safe means of collecting the intention, to call in aid the ground and cause of making the statute, and to have recourse to the preamble, which, according to DYER, C.J. (Stowel v. Lord Zouch (3), Plowd. at p. 369), is a key to open the minds of the makers of the Act, and the mischiefs which they are intended to redress."

I think it is very material to consider what was the intent of Parliament in passing 43 Eliz., c. 4. That Act itself is intituled, "An Acte to redresse the mis-employment of landes, goodes, and stokes of money heretofore given to charitable uses." And after reciting the objects with which certain lands and stocks had been limited, appointed, and assigned, it recites that the said lands, tenements, rents, and so forth, nevertheless had not been employed according to the charitable intent of the givers and founders thereof by reason of frauds, breaches of trust, and negligence in those that should pay, deliver, and employ the same. For redress and remedy whereof, be it enacted, etc. It then proceeds to create the tribunal and machinery for the restoration of the property so misemployed. It is very intelligible to my mind that the Court of Chancery or any court should have given the widest possible interpretation to an Act intended to remedy such abuses. The enumeration of charitable objects in the preamble of the statute was very soon interpreted not to be limited to the exact charities therein referred to. Where a purpose by analogy was deemed by the Court of Chancery to be within its spirit and intendment it was held to be "charitable" within the meaning of the statute.

In Jones v. Williams (4) "charity" is defined to be "a general public use": see also Thomson v. Shakespear (5), where LORD CAMPBELL, KNIGHT-BRUCE and TURNER, L.JJ. (though in the particular case, and for reasons beside the present controversy, they decide against the validity of the gift), show what width of interpretation in their view may be applied to the words "charitable use." Thus also "paving, lighting, cleansing, and improving a town" have been held to be within the equity of the statute of Elizabeth and "charitable." To build a house of correction or sessions-house is a charitable purpose: DUKE ON CHARITABLE USES, 109, 136; A.-G. v. Heelis (6); also to found a botanical garden. A fund for the establishment of lectures against cruelty to animals is a "charitable use." A gift "to the Queen's Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being, and to be by him

A appropriated for the benefit and advantage of my beloved country, Great Britain": Nightingale v. Goulbourn (7), is a "charitable purpose"; see also Theellusson v. Woodford (8).

In these and many like cases it appears to me that the distinction between that which is charitable in any reasonable sense and that to which trustees for any lawful and public purpose may be compelled to apply funds committed to their care, has been—I will not say confused—but so mixed that where it becomes necessary to define what is in its ordinary and natural sense "charitable" what is merely public or useful is lost sight of. And, indeed, for the purposes for which the court was then enforcing the performance of the trusts it is intelligible that such distinctions should be disregarded. If it is never necessary to distinguish between such heads as "religious," "parochial," "educational," but if all public purposes whatsoever which the law would support and the Court of Chancery enforce are in all statutes to be comprehended within the phrase "charitable," then the question is easily solved; but I do not think any statute or any decision has ever countenanced such a proposition. It is argued that the phrases "charitable trusts" and "charitable purposes" have always received the same construction in Ireland, to which the Act 43 Eliz., c. 4, did not extend, and that, therefore, apart from the particular statute, it has, so to speak, a technical and legal meaning in the law. I think the argument is not sound; the statement of fact on which it rests is literally accurate, but misleading, inasmuch as between 43 Eliz. (1601) and 10 Car. 1 (1634) there is very little authority obtainable as to what the views of the Irish courts were during that interval; and from that date the Irish Act, 10 Car. 1, certainly established what I will call the statutable meaning of those words as applicable to the subject-matter with which it dealt just as much as 43 Eliz.

To show that I am not overstating the identity of the statutes in question in their scope and object, it may be worth while to quote the language of Lord St. LEONARDS in Incorporated Society v. Richards (9). In delivering judgment as Lord Chancellor of Ireland, he observed (1 Dr. & War. at pp. 324, 325):

"I minutely compared the two Acts; placing the charitable uses enumerated in one in juxtaposition with those to be found in the other; and I find very little difference between them. Thus, the statute of Elizabeth speaks of relief to 'aged, impotent, and poor people; the maintenance of sick and maimed soldiers and mariners'; it enumerates a list of such cases, whilst that of Charles has those comprehensive words 'or for the relief or maintenance of any manner of poor, succourless, distressed, or impotent persons.' It would be difficult to show that any one of the particular charities set forth in the Act of Elizabeth is not included within those general words. Again, the statute of Elizabeth speaks of 'schools of learning, free schools and scholars of universities'; whilst that of Charles is thus expressed: 'for the erection, maintenance, or support of any college, school, lecture in divinity, or in any of the liberal arts or sciences.' The Act of Charles in this respect goes beyond that of Elizabeth, for the latter does not comprise in words 'the liberal arts and sciences.' Then, the Act of Elizabeth recites those gifts which had been or might be made for the repair of bridges, &c.; 'some for repairs of bridges, ports, havens, causeways, churches, sea-banks, and highways'; and I find in the statute of Charles mention made of similar gifts, not as in the other, collected all together, but in different parts; thus: 'for the building, re-edifying, or maintaining in repair of any church, college, school, or hospital'; and in another place, 'for the erection, building, maintenance, or repair of any bridges, causeways, cashes, paces, and highways within this realm.' The Act of Charles also provides 'for the maintenance of any minister and preacher of the Holy Word of God,' which was purposely omitted in the statute of Elizabeth (Duke, 125). After this the general words of the Act are, 'or for any other like lawful and charitable use and uses, warranted by the laws of this realm.' The statute of Charles seems, therefore, an almost exact pattern of the statute of Elizabeth, and I have but little doubt that its framers had the latter Act before them at the time they were preparing it." A

It is said that these exemptions have been allowed for a long period; that is true, but I am not able to assent to the view that the course pursued by the executive officers of the Crown is one which, under the circumstances of this case, could afford any clue to the true construction of the statute. I do not deny that, in the language of COCKBURN, C.J. (Fether v. R. (10) 6 B. & S. at pp. 290, 291), B

"where there has been an exposition of the law by judicial decision or a settled course of practice or understanding of the law among legal practitioners, the language of an instrument [or of a statute] may, in certain cases, be interpreted according to such a standard."

Take the case there referred to. I quote from the statement of facts by the Chief Justice (ibid. at pp. 289, 290): C

"It certainly appears that, at the time this patent was granted, a general understanding prevailed, founded on the practice of a long series of years, that if patented inventions were used in any of the departments of the public service the patentees would be remunerated by the ministers or officers of the Crown administering such departments, as though the use had been by private individuals. There can be no doubt that in numerous instances payments had been made to patentees for the use of patented inventions in the public service without objection or difficulty; and not only does no question appear to have been raised as to the right of the patentees by the minister of the Crown, but the legal advisers of the Crown appear also to have considered the right whether arising from the terms of the patent or from the existing practice, as so well settled that we find SIR JOHN JERVIS, the then Attorney-General, on an application for the renewal of the patent of Pettit v. Smith (11) before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the year 1852, two years only before the date of this patent, endeavouring to obtain the insertion of a condition that the Crown should have the use of the invention without payment; a course which obviously would have been unnecessary had the Crown been considered entitled to use the invention without such a provision. That the same view of the matter has prevailed until the present question was raised in this case, and that of Clare v. R. (12) which preceded it, is plain, as we find a similar application to that made by the Attorney-General in Re Pettit Smith's Patent (11), repeated in the subsequent cases of Re Carpenter's Patent (13) and Re Lancaster's Patent (14), the application for the renewal of the latter having occurred as late as in the last year. There can be little doubt that, on the faith of the understanding and practice referred to, many inventors have, at a great expense of time and money, perfected and matured inventions and taken out patents in the expectation of deriving a portion of their reward from the adoption of their inventions in the public service." D

Yet, notwithstanding this, they held that the patent could not be construed in pursuance of such a practice. Or, to put the limitation a little higher, as it is put by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Isherwood v. Oldknow (15) (3 M. & S. at p. 396), E

"where the general understanding of the law has not been speculative and theoretical, but where it has been the groundwork and substratum of practice [as in the case with which he was dealing] upon which powers of the character now in debate have been erected and acted upon from the time of Henry VIII down to 1815." F

I think it would be impossible to say that anything in the history of the administration of the Income Tax Act comes up to the standard required, even apart from the history of how the practice of allowing the exemption in debate had grown up. As a matter of fact we know that the practice is directly in conflict with the opinion given by the law officers of the Crown, SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN and LORD WESTBURY when respectively Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, in the year G

A 1856, who advised that "charitable purposes" were plainly distinguishable from "parochial purposes" in the Income Tax Acts, and, accordingly, advised against exemptions which certainly in the Court of Chancery would have been considered "charitable." We know also that the origin of the allowance was founded on the opinion of Mr. FULLER, to whom was assigned the duty of superintending the business relating to the claims of charities for exemption in the year 1843. The opinion
B given in 1856 does not appear, however, to have been acted on, since by a letter from the Treasury to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, dated Oct. 1, 1863, it was laid down that, notwithstanding the opinion of the law officers, the administration of the tax ought not to be altered by a purely administrative authority. All this appears from a return made to an order of the House of Lords, dated Aug. 3, 1888. But I confess I should regard with very great hesitation any inference
C derivable from the parliamentary paper in question, except the inference which negatives a universal and adopted practice as expounding the law. I cannot, therefore, agree that the statute receives any exposition from the fact that the practice has been such as has been described.

I also think the view of the true construction of an Act which is to apply to England, Ireland, and Scotland alike, is that it ought to be construed according to
D the canon of construction laid down by the Court of Session in Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate (1). It is a rule which has been acted on, not only in respect of taxing Acts, but of other enactments. Indeed, it is only part of a general principle of common sense which GROSE, J., laid down in a rating case (R. v. Hogg (16), 1 Term Rep. at p. 728), "a universal law cannot receive different constructions in different towns." And if (to quote the language of FRY, L.J.) words construed in E their technical sense would produce inequality, and construed in their popular sense would produce equality, you are to choose the latter. I should hesitate very much to qualify this rule of construction by pointing to instances in which inappropriate words had been used in a statute. That, in fact, the language of an Act of Parliament may be founded on some mistake, and that words may be clumsily used, I do not deny. But I do not think it is competent to any court to proceed upon
F the assumption that the legislature has made a mistake. Whatever the real fact may be, I think a court of law is bound to proceed upon the assumption that the legislature is an ideal person that does not make mistakes. It must be assumed that it has intended what it has said, and I think any other view of the mode in which one must approach the interpretation of a statute would give authority for an interpretation of the language of an Act of Parliament which would be attended
G with the most serious consequences.

I am not satisfied, after fully considering the statutes and decisions which the care of LORD WATSON has collected for our guidance, that the principle of the decision of the court in Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate (1) is not quite reconcilable with all of them. That "godly" and "pious" are convertible terms, and may be so treated, is true. With reference to the subject-matter of the decisions
H to which my noble friend has referred, it is to be observed that the supply of education, or the relief of poverty, largely entered into the purpose referred to, and that the question then in debate did not raise the question now before your Lordships. In not one of them do I find such a latitude of interpretation of "charitable purposes," as those which I have quoted as being, within the contemplation of the English Court of Chancery. "charitable purposes," and they are also open to an
I observation of a more general character, which I shall have to make presently when dealing with the particular donation now before your Lordships for consideration. In common with the Court of Appeal, I think that the principle laid down by the Court of Session in construing an Act which is to apply to the three kingdoms, is a sound one, though perhaps verbal criticisms may be applied to the language in which it is conveyed.

LORD CAMPBELL's observation in Lord Saltoun v. Advocate-General (17) I think is the true rule: though even there, perhaps, criticism might be applied to the exact language in which it is expressed. I cannot concur with the view which has found favour with one of your Lordships, that the technicalities which LORD CAMPBELL thought were to be disregarded were not technical expressions in the Act. The word which was in debate was "predecessor," whether that word was to receive its meaning according to technical application in Scottish law or its more popular meaning was the turning point of the case, and it was with reference to the use of that word "predecessor" that LORD CAMPBELL's observations were made. Neither do I think one gets much light from Gordon of Park (18), where, by the Act of Union itself, it was ordained "that the law of treason should be administered as much as possible alike in the two countries." That Act, therefore, recognised that differences did exist, and enacted in somewhat loose phraseology that they were to be administered "as much as possible alike." I do not find that in any Scottish Act, or in any Scottish decision, "institutions for general public purposes," "protection of animals," "extension of knowledge," "museums," "libraries," or the like, "diffusion of geographical knowledge," "homes for lost dogs," or "anti-vivisection" societies, would be treated in Scotland as the objects of charitable donation, and the argument involves the necessity of establishing, not that there are points in which the English and Scottish use of that word may be similar, or even identical, but that generally, and in the Scottish and English law they must have practically the same meaning. I should hesitate very much to differ from the Court of Session on that subject, and certainly there is nothing which has been brought before your Lordships during the argument which, to my mind, justified the proposition that the use of the words "charitable purposes" in the Court of Chancery, which, as I have pointed out, comprehends all the above objects, has ever been adopted in the law of Scotland.

I admit the justice of the criticism which suggests that words are sometimes put into an Act ex abundante cautela, and would not, therefore, rely upon mere redundancy of expression, which I agree may be inserted for securing some particular institution which it is thought might otherwise be deprived of such statutable exemption; but I do not think that the same observation applies to a series of statutes in which "charitable" is distinguished from "public" purpose, or religious, or educational, as indeed is the case in the statute upon which most reliance is placed—the [repealed] Succession Duty Act, 1853 [see s. 16]—where the words are "charitable or public purposes." I do not deny the validity as an argument of the drafting of that clause, which having described the property as subject to a trust for "charitable" or "public" purposes, and having all through the clause spoken of "such" property, finally speaks of it as "the charity" property, a phrase in itself not quite accurate; but I agree that if a question were to arise whether there was the power of securing the amount of duty upon the property, the subject of a trust for "public" or for "charitable" purposes, any court would construe the words "charity property" as being comprehended within the intended power to charge; but it would be rather upon the construction of the whole section than that the words themselves import an identity between the words "charitable" and "public."

The fact, however, remains, that in various statutes the word "charitable" is distinguished by the legislature from "public," "educational," "religious"; and, in not one instance that I have been able to find, do the words run "or other charitable purpose," which one would think would be the natural mode of expressing the meaning now insisted on. One can understand the good sense of the effort to give the widest interpretation to such a phrase as "charitable uses," as in the English and Irish statutes, or the words "pious donations" of the Scottish statute of 1633. The evil was the same in all three countries, viz., the misapplication of donations made for the benefit of people who could not be represented by any particular litigant, and whose interests were neglected by the dishonest appropriation of gifts intended for useful, public, or charitable purposes. But such considerations have no application to a Taxing Act. There is no purpose in a Taxing Act but to raise money, and an exemption is just as much within this criticism as any other part of the Act, since every exemption throws an additional burden on the rest of the

A community. It is suggested, indeed, that the reason for an exemption may be that the public nature of the interest is that which may justify the exemption. I cannot find any trace of such a principle in the statute, and I do not think it is borne out by decisions where the incidence of rates has been in question. It was undoubtedly thought that property held for public purposes was not rateable; but this is now clearly not the law. It is settled that no such exemption applies: see Mersey Docks v. Cameron (19); Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Adamson (20); Leith Harbour and Docks Comrs. v. Inspector of the Poor (21). The construction of a taxing Act appears to me to present no analogy to the class of Acts, English, Irish, or Scottish, to which I have above referred, and I cannot apply to this Act the principle of construction which those Acts may very justly have received.

C To come now to the particular bequests before us, and to the use of the word "charitable" in the particular Act we are construing. I would say, without attempting an exhaustive definition or even description of what may be comprehended within the term "charitable purpose," I conceive that the real ordinary use of the word "charitable," as distinguished from any technicalities whatsoever, always does involve the relief of poverty. No one would doubt what was the meaning of a charity sermon, a charity school, or of a person giving service gratuitously because it was for a charity. And it seems to me that the Court of Appeal did not so much differ with the Lord Chief Justice as to the true exposition of the word involving the relief of poverty, as in the application of the proposition: What would be a relief of poverty? As to that, I think it would be impossible to give an adequate exposition of what would presumably be in the mind of the legislature, without regarding the circumstances of the time, and the state of public feeling when the legislation in question was under debate. At a time, for instance, when religious instruction was regarded as being as important as the maintenance of life, then if people were without the means of obtaining religious instruction, one can well understand the principle that to give them the necessary religious instruction, which the argument assumes they would not otherwise be able to obtain, would be in the sense which I have indicated "charitable." But the difficulty I have in reconciling the decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal with the principle they have laid down is that, in the particular gift under debate, purposes appear to be contemplated having no relation to poverty at all. Take the first case of foreign missions: I suppose the conversion of the wealthiest chieftain to the views of the Moravian Mission would be just as much within the object of the trust as any other purpose. The Master of the Rolls, while enlarging the purposes which may be described as charitable beyond the mere relief of physical necessities, as to which I do not disagree, adds these words:

H "You may desire to convert the richest people, and very often do. If you desire to convert them to your religious opinions, whatever they may be, not on account of their poverty, but because you think it is desirable that their religious views should be like yours, that does not come within this canon. A religious object is not necessarily a charitable object within the sense that I have put it."

I With that view I entirely concur, and, as I have said, the difficulty I have is in applying such a rule to justify the exemption here claimed. I do not understand how it can be said that this trust is only for a mission to convert simply poor heathens. It seems to me (to use the language of the Master of the Rolls himself) "a mission to convert heathens without regard to their poverty at all." And it is to be remembered that, so far as the property is entitled to exemption, it must not only be applicable to, but applied to the charitable purposes in favour of which the exemption is claimed. I think it would be a surprise to the Moravian body itself to find that their missions were either exclusively or substantially applied only to impoverished heathens, and that heathens well off in their own country were beyond the scheme of their missions. To my mind it is obvious that the object of the mission is the propagation of the Moravian tenets among persons whom the Moravian brethren conceive to be in darkness and wish to enlighten by the views which they themselves profess, and that the element of poverty, as applicable necessarily to the objects of their efforts, is as much beside the Moravian view as the colour of the converts or the situation of their territory. That there are some objects which would be charitable objects under these trusts, I do not deny; but the question here argued is whether the funds are all applicable and applied to charitable purposes. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed.

LORD WATSON stated the facts as set out above and continued.—If I could accept, without reserve, the opinions expressed in Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate (1) with respect to the meaning of the term "charitable," I should still entertain doubts as to the rule applied to its decision, which has been followed in this case by the majority of the English judges. The only principle derivable from Lord Saltoun v. Advocate-General (17), which can aid in the decision of this case, appears to me to be that the Act of 1842 must, if possible, be so interpreted as to make the incidence of its taxation the same in both countries. In that case the language which the court had to construe, which was not technical, had, when read in the light of the context, the effect of producing the equality which the legislature presumably contemplated. But there existed outside the Act a technical rule of Scottish feudal conveyancing, which would, if permitted to qualify the language of the Act, have disturbed that equality; and this House held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), that an extrinsic technicality productive of that result ought to be disregarded. It does not, in my opinion, necessarily follow from that decision that the popular meaning of a word employed in a taxing statute must be adopted in cases where the word has a definite legal meaning in England and no definite popular meaning either in England or Scotland.

I have been unable to find that the word "charitable," taken by itself, has any well-defined popular meaning in Scotland or elsewhere. It is a relative term, and takes its colour from the specific objects to which it is applied. While it is applicable to acts and objects of a purely eleemosynary character, it may with equal propriety be used to designate acts and purposes which do not exclusively concern the poor, but are dictated by a spirit of charity or benevolence. In the latter sense the meaning of the term is practically, although not absolutely, co-extensive with that which has been attributed to it by the Court of Chancery. Assuming, as the Court of Session has decided, that the term has no technical meaning in Scottish law, ought "charitable," as it occurs in the Act of 1842, to receive that wide yet legitimate popular interpretation which practically harmonises with its import in English law, or must its narrowest conventional use be accepted as matter of fixed legal construction?

I have not found it necessary for the purposes of this case to determine these questions, because I am satisfied that, in legislative language, at least, the expression "charitable" has hitherto borne a comprehensive meaning according to Scottish as well as according to English law. On this point I have the less hesitation in differing from the learned judges of the Court of Session, because I do not find that the considerations which have led me to that conclusion were entertained by them, or were even submitted to them in argument. So far as I am able to discover, "godly" and "pious," as applied to trusts or uses, had, in early times, much the same significance in Scotland as in England. Their meaning was not limited to objects of a religious or eleemosynary character, but embraced all objects which a well-disposed person might promote from motives of philanthropy. For instance, the Scottish Act, 1592, c. 162, applies the epithet "godly" to a gift by Queen Mary of lands and annual rents for sustentation of the ministry within the burgh of Edinburgh and the "entertainment" of its hospitals. The extensive signification of "pious" may be illustrated by the terms of the Act 1685, c. 18, which deprived patrons of their right to stipend accruing during the vacancy of a cure, and enacted that it should in future be employed by them "on pious uses within the respective

A parishes." Of these pious uses three are "more particularly" specified, these being "the building and repairing of bridges, repairing of churches or entertainment of the poor." In Lord Saltoun v. Lady Pittsligo (22), the Court of Session held that the repair of a public harbour was a pious use within the meaning of the Act, although they disallowed the patron's outlay on the ground that the harbour was beyond the limits of the vacant parish.

B The expression "charitable," which is used in the Act of Elizabeth [Charitable Gifts Act, 1601] as a synonym of "godly," is employed in the same sense with "pious" in the Scottish statute 1633, c. 6, which is entitled an Act against "the inverting of pious donations." It proceeds on the preamble that certain gifts in lands, heritages, and sums of money, "in favour of colleges, schools, hospitals, and other pious uses," had been inverted to other purposes, "to the evil example of

C others and the hindrance of the like charitable works against all reason and conscience." It accordingly enacts that such inversions shall cease; and that action shall be competent to the "said kirks, colleges, and others," and to "the bishops and ordinaries within the dioceses where the said kirks, schools, and others lye," against the heirs, executors, or others entrusted with the administration of the gift; and also provides that, on application to the court, letters of horning shall issue

D without citation of parties. According to the plain language of the Act of 1633, all donations for pious purposes, including gifts made to the church for religious purposes, were regarded as charitable donations. I see no reason to doubt that the word "charitable" was so used in its ordinary and legal sense, or that Mr. Baird's trust would have been considered a trust for charitable purposes by the legislators who passed the Act. If the Income Tax Act, 1842, had been enacted by the

E Scottish Parliament in 1633, I do not think the Lords of Session would at that time have adopted the narrow construction put upon the word "charitable" by their successors in the year 1888.

The use of the word in the early law of Scotland, or in statutes of the Scottish Parliament, would, no doubt, be of little relevancy to the present question if it could be shown to have acquired a more restricted meaning in the modern law

F language of that country. The reported decisions of the Court of Session throw little, if any, light upon the question, for a reason which is sufficiently obvious. Ever since its institution the court has exercised plenary jurisdiction over the administration of all trusts, whether public or private, irrespective of the particular purposes to which the estate or income of the trust may be appropriated, and there has consequently been no room for those numerous questions, as to a trust being

G charitable or not, which have arisen in England under the statute of Elizabeth.

While the Scottish cases cannot be said to afford any precise definition of what constitutes a charitable trust purpose, some of them do appear to point to a more liberal interpretation than that which was adopted by the court in the case of the Baird trust. In Ferguson v. Marjoribanks (23), which was decided in 1853, a testator had bequeathed a sum of money to trustees, with directions to apply the

H annual interest

"in the erection of a free school in such part of the parish of Bathgate, as my said trustees or the major part of them shall think fit and proper, for the education of the youth of the said parish."

The benefits of the foundation were not confined to the poor, nor could they reasonably be said to be in the main intended for the poor. Yet the Lord President McNEILL (afterwards LORD COLONSAY) describes the bequest as one "in perpetuity for a charitable purpose"; and, in the note appended to his judgment as Lord Ordinary, LORD RUTHERFORD, the most learned Scottish lawyer of the period, speaks of it as "the charity." In this House, noble and learned Lords, in disposing of appeals from Scotland, have expressed themselves in terms which point in the same direction. LORD GIFFARD, delivering judgment in Hill v. Burns (24), uses the expression "charitable" as equivalent to "charitable and benevolent." In Aberdeen University v. Irvine (25), a trust for college bursars, who did not necessarily

in all cases of propagandism there is mixed up a wish for the prevalence of those opinions we entertain, because they are ours. A

But what is a "charitable purpose?" Whatever definition is given, if it is right as far as it goes, in my opinion, this trust is not within it. I will attempt one. I think a "charitable purpose" is where assistance is given to the bringing up, feeding, clothing, lodging, and education of those who from poverty, or comparative poverty, stand in need of such assistance (see per LORD COLERIDGE, 22 Q.B.D. at p. 301)—that a temporal benefit is meant, being money, or having a money value. This definition is probably insufficient. It very likely would not include some charitable purposes, though I cannot think what, and include some not charitable, though also I cannot think what, but I think it substantially correct, and that no well-founded amendment of it would include the purposes to which this fund is dedicated. TODD'S JOHNSON gives the meaning "kind in giving alms, liberal to the poor, kind in judging of others, disposed to tenderness, benevolent." But of course the word must be construed in the sentence where it is found, and the first meaning alone is applicable when the question is whether this trust is for charitable purposes within the Income Tax Act. Indeed, the word "benevolent" seems to me to have caused the difficulty. The purposes of this trust are doubtless "benevolent"; good was wished to others; but certainly every benevolent purpose is not charitable. I think there is some fund for providing oysters at one of the Inns of Court for the Benchers; this, however benevolent, would hardly be called charitable; so of a trust to provide a band of music on the village green. B

I cannot quite accept LORD ESHER's definition; he says,

"allowances are to be made when the rents and profits are given in trust to be expended in assisting people to something considered by the donor to be for their benefit." E

But that would include such cases as I have put, which I do not think his Lordship would consider charitable purposes. He proceeds, and I agree with him,

"and which assistance the donor intends shall be given to people who in his opinion cannot without such assistance by reason of poverty obtain that benefit." F

Be it so, but that excludes this trust; there is no poverty contemplated in those who are to be benefited, nor any notion that an addition to their means would procure them that benefit. What of a trust for the conversion of the Jews? Is that a charitable purpose? If so, what of a trust for their reconversion? It seems to me that the extended meaning of "charitable purposes" would include every case of amusement and pleasure that could be thought of. I cannot think this was the intention of the legislature. It is suggested that a fund for the saving of shipwrecked sailors would be for a charitable purpose. That is not this case. But would it? If so, would jumping into the sea to save a sailor be an act of charity? We say: "He takes a charitable view of his conduct," "kind in judging of others," using the word as equivalent to "benevolent." It is confounding the two words that seems to me to lead to the difficulty. G

What was the intention, and why the exemption is made in the Act, is, of course, very much guess-work. But something like a reasonable ground may be suggested in this: that when the gift is of such a character as I have suggested in my definition, to tax the charity is to tax the poor, or take from the poor who would otherwise get the amount of the tax. It is to be remembered, as has been mentioned, that to exempt any subject of taxation from a tax is to add to the burden on taxpayers generally, and a very large exemption must be made, if the respondent is right, for the benefit of so-called charities, many of which are simply mischievous. On these considerations I hold that the natural meaning of the words "charitable purposes" excludes one-half of the income of these funds. I

I now come to the other ground on which the exemption is claimed. It is said that, whether or not the natural meaning of "charitable purposes" includes the purposes of this trust, those words have an artificial meaning, or a meaning given

A by statute or use, and must be interpreted accordingly. The argument, as I understand it, is this: The Charitable Gifts Act, 1601, is entitled:

“An Act to redress the Misemployment of Lands, Goods, and Stocks of Money heretofore given to Charitable Uses.”

B It then enumerates a variety of uses or purposes, some of which are not charitable according to any ordinary definition of the word; therefore, “charitable uses” in the title means charitable uses, and more than those, benevolent uses, and uses for the public or general good, or that of portions of the public, or of individuals. Then it is said that this interpretation of “charitable uses” has been followed by other statutes, and by decisions from the passing of the statute hitherto, and so “charitable purposes,” when those words occur in any statute, must be understood
C as including whatever would be held to be within the statute of Elizabeth, and that the purposes here would be so held.

I cannot follow this reasoning. It would fall to the ground if the title of the statute had been “charitable and other benevolent uses,” or some similar expression, as it ought to have been, in strictness. Because, as I have said, I think it is certain that some of the purposes mentioned in the preamble are in no sense charitable.
D I cannot agree with FRY, L.J. It is a strange thing that the title should make things “charitable” which are not so, rather than that the preamble should be understood as going beyond the title, which compendiously and conveniently spoke of charitable uses only. I believe that all that has been done is what I have said, viz., that later decisions and statutes have spoken of cases as “charitable uses,” meaning cases within or dealt with as though within the statute of Elizabeth.
E An example of this will be seen in s. 66 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 [repealed with saving by the Charities Act, 1960], the interpretation clause of which says:

“charity shall mean every endowed foundation and institution taking or to take effect in England and Wales, and coming within the meaning, purview, and interpretation of the statute of 43 Eliz., c. 4, or as to which, or the administration of the revenues or property thereof, the Court of Chancery has or may exercise jurisdiction.”

I have said that some cases within the Act of 1601 could not, according to any reasonable definition of the words, be said to be “charitable purposes.” I take, for example, “schools of learning,” not limited to the poor, “repair of sea-banks,”
G “relief, etc., for houses of correction,” which is in aid of rates not paid by the poor. So, also, a bequest for keeping chimes in repair has been held to be within the statute: Turner v. Ogden (28); perhaps, because causing a lessening of church rates, if, indeed, they could have been applied to such a purpose, which I do not know. So, also, a bequest upon trust to pay, divide, or dispose thereof for the benefit and advancement of such societies’ subscriptions or purposes having regard to the
H glory of God in the spiritual welfare of his creatures: Townsend v. Carus (29). Let it not be supposed that I find any fault with courts of equity for calling every trust within the statute of Elizabeth a charity. It was not strictly accurate, but was concise, and saved a circumlocution.

There is a very difficult and embarrassing matter to be considered. Everyone admits, I believe, that the construction of the Income Tax Act ought to be the
I same in Scotland as in England; but the Scottish courts say that the natural meaning of the words “charitable purposes” does not include such purposes as these, and that those words have not acquired a technical meaning to that effect. What answer is it to say that by English law it is so called for certain purposes? I do not agree it is so called; but, suppose it were, what answer would it be? Suppose the case arose in England, and we were asked to interpret a statute, not according to its ordinary meaning, but according to some mode of expression used in Scotland? On the other hand, your Lordships have the advice of LORD WATSON, who says the words ought to be interpreted in favour of the respondent in Scotland.

in all cases of propagandism there is mixed up a wish for the prevalence of those opinions we entertain, because they are ours. A

It was not strictly accurate, but was concise, and saved a circumlocution.

I There is a very difficult and embarrassing matter to be considered. Everyone admits, I believe, that the construction of the Income Tax Act ought to be the same in Scotland as in England; but the Scottish courts say that the natural meaning of the words "charitable purposes" does not include such purposes as these, and that those words have not acquired a technical meaning to that effect. What answer is it to say that by English law it is so called for certain purposes? I do not agree it is so called; but, suppose it were, what answer would it be? Suppose the case arose in England, and we were asked to interpret a statute, not according to its ordinary meaning, but according to some mode of expression used in Scotland? On the other hand, your Lordships have the advice of LORD WATSON, who says the words ought to be interpreted in favour of the respondent in Scotland.

I cannot think so. FRY, L.J., says the words are technical, and should be interpreted in Scotland as in England. I cannot see why. LORD ESHER and LOPES, L.J., do not agree. I do not know that they have a right to express an opinion on Scottish law, though we must. It seems to me that the argument shows that that has happened in Scotland which has happened in England, viz., that everything charitable, godly, pious, came to be compendiously called "charitable." I think this appears from the instances cited by LORD WATSON. Take Aberdeen University v. Irvine (25), where a "trust for college bursars who did not necessarily belong to the class of indigent persons" was dealt with as a charity. It was benevolent, doubtless, but not charitable. A

I think the judgment on this should be reversed. As the majority of your Lordships think otherwise, the State will be a subscriber of £17 a year to B

"supporting, maintaining, and subsidising the missionary establishment among heathen nations of the Protestant Episcopal Church known by the name of the Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren." C

Whether this was meant by the authors of the Income Tax Act? If it was, why? And whether it will be continued? are questions not before us. D

LORD HERSCHELL.—Two points were made on behalf of the appellants, the Commissioners of Income Tax, at your Lordships' Bar. It was said, first, that the respondent was not entitled to the allowance which he claimed under s. 61 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, and it was next contended that, even if entitled to that allowance, mandamus was not the proper remedy for a refusal to grant it. At the close of the arguments on behalf of the appellants, all your Lordships were of opinion that the latter point had not been made good. I confess it appears to me very clearly to be a case for a mandamus if the commissioners have wrongly refused to grant the allowance and to give the certificate provided for by the statute. The duty of granting the allowance in certain specified cases is imposed upon the commissioners by the statute in unequivocal terms, and no reason was assigned why the ordinary remedy by mandamus was inapplicable in the case of a breach of this statutory duty, except the suggestion that the respondent should have proceeded by petition of right. Re Nathan (30) was relied on in support of this proposition. But that was a very different case. It was sought by that proceeding to compel the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to make payment of a certain sum of money to the applicant for the mandamus; and it was held that for such a purpose recourse must be had to a petition of right. Here the applicant does not ask that the appellants should be commanded to make any payment. He seeks only that they should be compelled to grant an allowance and certificate, which it is necessary for him to obtain before he is in a position to require payment of the sum which it is no doubt his ultimate object to recover. Until he obtains this allowance and certificate, he is not in a position to maintain a petition of right. E

The main, and indeed the only, question arising on this appeal, apart from the objection to the form of procedure with which I have already dealt, is, to my mind, one of very considerable difficulty. The Income Tax Act provides that allowances shall be granted by the commissioners "on the rents and profits of lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages belonging to any hospital, public school, or almshouse, or vested in trustees for charitable purposes, so far as the same are applied to charitable purposes." The question in controversy is: What is the scope of the term "charitable purposes" in this enactment? The respondent is the treasurer of the Church of the United Brethren, commonly called Moravians. He claimed an allowance in respect of certain lands vested in trustees for objects connected with that community. Two-fourths of the rent of these lands are by the trust deed directed to be applied to objects of an eleemosynary and educational character, which were admitted by the appellants at your Lordships' Bar to be "charitable purposes" within the statute. It is only necessary, therefore, to consider the F G H I

A application of the remaining moiety. The trust is in these terms :

"As to two equal fourth parts thereof for the general purposes of maintaining, supporting, and advancing the missionary establishments among heathen nations of the Protestant Episcopal Church, known by the name of Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren."

B The question at issue may be shortly stated thus : Are lands which are vested in trustees for the purpose of maintaining and advancing missions among the heathen, vested in them for "charitable purposes," within the meaning of the statute? This is all that your Lordships have to determine, but it is impossible to determine it without arriving at a conclusion as to the construction to be put upon the words "charitable purposes" in the statute with which we are concerned. The question
C is consequently one of far-reaching importance. It is said by the respondent that the expression trust "for charitable purposes" is well known to the law of this country, and has acquired, by a current of decisions in the Court of Chancery, a clearly defined meaning which has been recognised and adopted by the legislature in numerous enactments and that the same meaning ought to be attributed to it in the Income Tax Act. There can be no doubt that the words in question have,
D in the law of England, and of Ireland also, the well-defined meaning alleged. And if the Income Tax Acts applied to England and Ireland alone, I do not think there could be any ground for hesitation in adopting the construction contended for, and interpreting the words in the sense in which they have been again and again employed by the legislature. But it is said on behalf of the appellants that the Income Tax Acts extend to Scotland also, and that the suggested construction is on that account inadmissible, inasmuch as the words "charitable purposes" have, in Scot-
E land, a much more limited meaning. The exemption, it is said, must have been intended to be co-extensive in the three countries, and, therefore, a meaning of the words must be sought for which obtains in all. If the words had a technical meaning in Scotland different from that prevailing in this country, I think the argument would be irresistible, and I should feel a difficulty in resisting it if they had a well-defined and recognised meaning, even though it were a popular and not a technical F one.

The construction to be put upon the enactment under consideration came before the Court of Session in Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate (1). The learned judges were of opinion that the words "charitable purposes" must be read in their popular signification, and could not have the comprehensive meaning attached to them in the English law. The Lord President said :

G "Charity is the relief of poverty, and a charitable act, or a charitable purpose, consists in relieving poverty; whatever goes beyond that is not within the meaning of the word 'charity,' as it occurs in this statute."

LORD SHAND took the same view, but apparently limited the application of the term to the relief of physical necessities resulting from poverty. He said :

H "I think the term 'charitable purposes only,' used in a modern statute, in the absence of any words indicating that a wider meaning is intended, is to be taken in its ordinary sense, as referring to fund given for the relief or pecuniary assistance of persons in poverty. I think it relates to funds dedicated to the relief of physical necessity or want, to funds given as alms, or as a provision
I for the relief of persons from physical privation or suffering arising from poverty."

I am unable to agree with the view that the sense in which "charities" and "charitable purpose" are popularly used is so restricted as this. I certainly cannot think that they are limited to the relief of wants occasioned by lack of pecuniary means. Many examples may, I think, be given of endowments for the relief of human necessities, which would be as generally termed charities as hospitals or almshouses, where, nevertheless, the necessities to be relieved do not result from poverty in its limited sense of the lack of money. Take, for example, an institution for saving the lives of shipwrecked mariners. Its object is to render assistance to those in dire want of it; to meet a form of human need which appeals to the benevolent feelings of mankind, but not one which has its origin in the lack of money. Nevertheless, I do not believe that anyone would hesitate to call it a charity, or to say that money expended in rescuing drowning men was applied to a charitable purpose. Or again, what of a society founded for the protection of children of tender years from cruelty? Would not this be commonly described as a charitable purpose? And yet it is not pecuniary destitution that creates the necessity which such a society is designed to relieve. It is the helplessness of those who are the objects of its care which evokes the assistance of the benevolent.

I think, then, that the popular conception of a charitable purpose covers the relief of any form of necessity, destitution, or helplessness which excites the compassion or sympathy of men, and so appeals to their benevolence for relief. Nor am I prepared to say that the relief of what is often termed spiritual destitution or need is excluded from this conception of charity. On the contrary, no insignificant portion of the community consider what are termed spiritual necessities as not less imperatively calling for relief, and regard the relief of them not less as a charitable purpose than the ministering to physical needs; and I do not believe that the application of the word "charity" to the former of these purposes is confined to those who entertain the view which I have just indicated. It is, I think, constantly and generally used in the same sense quite irrespective of any belief or disbelief in the advantage or expediency of the expenditure of money on these objects. It is a mistake to suppose that men limit their use of the word "charity" to those forms of benevolent assistance which they deem to be wise, expedient, and for the public good. There is no common consent in this country as to the kind of assistance which it is to the public advantage that men should render to their fellows, or as to the relative importance of the different forms which this assistance takes. There are some who hold that even hospitals and almshouses, which are specially mentioned by the legislature, discourage thrift, and do, upon the whole, harm, rather than good. This may be an extreme view entertained by few, but there are many who are strongly convinced that doles, and other forms of beneficence, which must undoubtedly be included, however narrow the definition given to the term "charitable purpose," are contrary to the public interest; that they tend to pauperise and thus to perpetuate the evil they are intended to cure, and ought to be discouraged rather than stimulated. It is common enough to hear it said of a particular form of almsgiving that it is no real charity, or even that it is a mischievous form of charity.

I think, then, that a purpose may be regarded by common understanding as a charitable purpose, and so described in popular phraseology, even though opinions differ widely as to its expediency or utility. The truth is, that the word "charity" has no sharply-defined popular meaning. It is used at different times in varying senses, broader or narrower. Sometimes, no doubt, it is employed in the limited sense adopted by the Court of Session, but at others it serves to embrace all expenditure which motives of benevolence induce men to make for the benefit of their fellows. If, then, one were driven to interpret the words under construction according to their popular signification, I think the proper course would be to prefer the broadest sense in which they are employed, and that such an interpretation would embrace the case with which your Lordships have to deal. But an examination of the statutes referred to by LORD WATSON has satisfied me that in the language of Scottish legislation they have been employed in a sense practically co-extensive with that attributed to them by the law of England, and there are, so far as I know, no decisions of the courts of Scotland prior to Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate (1) which have put a narrower interpretation on them.

Under these circumstances, I think the proper course is to interpret the words in the Income Tax Act in the sense in which they have been used alike in the law of both countries. I ought, perhaps, to notice the argument presented to your Lordships, that some more limited meaning of these words is suggested by the

A provisions in connection with which they are found, and the specific exceptions contained in the statute. I think that an argument derived from the specific mention of certain subjects in the exemptions found in a taxing Act is of little weight. Such specific exemptions are often introduced ex majori cautela to quiet the fears of those whose interests are engaged or sympathies aroused in favour of some particular institution, and who are apprehensive that it may not be held to fall within a general exemption. I concur in thinking that the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The circumstances which have given rise to the present question are peculiar. The question itself is important, but it does not, I think, involve serious difficulty. Income Tax Acts have been in force in this country without any intermission since 1842, and, with one long interval, ever since the close of the last century. Every act has contained an exemption in favour of property dedicated to charitable purposes. What are charitable purposes within the meaning of these Acts the legislature has nowhere defined; but from the very first it was assumed, as a matter not open to controversy, that the exemption applied to all trusts known to the law of England as charitable uses, or trusts for charitable purposes. On that principle, without inequality and apparently without difficulty, the law was administered in England and Scotland, and afterwards, when the tax extended to Ireland, throughout the whole of the United Kingdom. At length, about three or four years ago, the Board of Inland Revenue discovered that the meaning of the legislature was not to be ascertained from the legal definition of the expressions actually found in the statute, but to be gathered from the popular use of the word “charity.” Proceeding on this view they refused remissions in cases in which the remission had been claimed and allowed as a matter of right for more than forty years continuously.

The action of the Board was confirmed in Scotland by the Court of Session, in Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate (1). There it was held that, “in ordinary, familiar, and popular use,” charity had only one sense, the relief of poverty, and that the exemption related to funds given as alms, or as a provision for the relief of persons from physical privations or sufferings arising from poverty, and that it went no further. The opinion of the court was based on a proposition which I will state in these words of the Lord President:

“It appears to me that in the construction of taxing Acts the court must always take it for granted, where these Acts apply to the whole United Kingdom, that the words used by the legislature are used in their popular and ordinary signification, and are not technical legal terms belonging to one system of jurisprudence, which may exist in one part of the United Kingdom and not in another. The occurrence of such technical terms as these in a taxing Act would have the most disturbing and confusing effect, and it would be very difficult indeed to administer such a statute as applicable to the whole United Kingdom. And, accordingly, we always find in these taxing Acts that the words used are words of ordinary meaning, which are understood by everybody, whether in England, Scotland, or Ireland, in the same sense.”

In deciding the present case the Divisional Court (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., GRANTHAM, J., dissenting) followed and approved the reasoning of the Court of Session. The decision was reversed on appeal, but the majority of the Court of Appeal agreed with the Lord Chief Justice so far as to hold that the legal meaning of the words in question must be rejected in favour of their popular signification. They thought, however, that the Lord Chief Justice had taken too narrow a view. LORD ESHER, M.R., with whom LOPES, L.J., concurred, by way of giving an explanation of practical use, paraphrased the enactment as follows:

“Allowances are to be made in respect of the duties on the rents and profits of lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages vested in trustees when the rents and profits are given in trust to be expended in assisting people to something considered by the donor to be for their benefit, and which assistance the donors intends shall be given to people who, in his opinion, cannot without such assistance, by reason of poverty, obtain that benefit, and where the intention of the donor is to assist such poverty as the substantial cause of his gift."

FRY, L.J., differing from the Court of Session, considered that the expression "charitable purposes" had acquired a technical meaning in Scotland as it undoubtedly had in England and Ireland, and that, consequently, he was bound to adopt that meaning. In the course of the argument at your Lordships' Bar the learned counsel for the Crown admitted that the construction adopted by the Court of Session and the Lord Chief Justice was too narrow, but they insisted that the words must be construed in some popular sense, and without attempting any definition they contended that the expression "charitable purposes," in its ordinary acceptance among persons of education, would not include the purpose of converting the heathen.

In this state of perplexity the question remains for your Lordships to decide. It will be convenient, I think, in the first place to deal with the more important considerations which seem to have weighed with the courts in approaching the subject. Foremost of all is the very broad proposition on which the decision of the Court of Session rests, which has been adopted rather hastily, I think, by the Lord Chief Justice and the majority of the Court of Appeal. Is it true, as a matter of fact, that we always find in these taxing Acts that the words used are words of ordinary meaning, understood by everybody in the three kingdoms in the same sense, and not technical legal terms in use in one part of the United Kingdom? I could wish it were so. But we are not living in Utopia, where a perfect or ideal lawgiver may be had very readily. The Income Tax Acts themselves form an instructive commentary on the proposition of the Lord President. In the earliest Income Tax Act, the Act of 1799, except when it deals with commissioners for districts in Scotland, the language is the language of an English lawyer. So little attention was paid to the legal phraseology of Scotland, that the word "heritages" does not, I think, occur in the Act. The term used to denote real property is the expression "lands, tenements, and hereditaments." In the Acts of 1803 and 1806 the word "heritages" is introduced, but it will not be found inserted in all places where it seems to be required. Even in the Act of 1806 you will find the words "hereditaments" and "messuages"—words I should suppose not of ordinary meaning in Scotland, nor familiar in their English sense to Scottish lawyers—used as applicable to all parts of Great Britain.

Another example, not without some bearing on the present question, is presented by the Succession Duty Act, 1853. That is a taxing Act. It extends to the three kingdoms. No statute was ever drawn with more care. Studiously and with great skill it avoids technical expressions wherever they would be likely to create confusion. Yet there we find the very word "charity," which has given rise to all this argument, used in its technical sense according to English law, and applied to property belonging to charitable or public trusts in Scotland as well as to property dedicated to charitable purposes in England. In s. 16 the Act provides for the case of "a succession to property subject to a trust for any charitable or public purposes," and it goes on to give the trustee for any such property, who is made responsible for the duty and a debtor to the Crown in the event of non-payment, power to raise the duty. How is it to be raised? All the Act says is, "upon the security of the charity property." Again I ask, is the Lord President correct in saying that in construing a taxing Act extending to the whole of the United Kingdom, the court must always take it for granted "that the words used by the legislature are used in their popular signification"? I can find no authority for such a proposition.

There is, indeed, a passage in the judgment of LORD CAMPBELL in Lord Saltoun v. Advocate-General (17), which at first sight looks like an authority, and is so treated in the rubric. In reality it has no bearing upon the point. The case was

A this. Lord Saltoun, under an entail created by his grandmother, succeeded to a settled property on the death of his uncle without heirs male of his body. What was the rate of duty? Was it 3 per cent., as on a succession from an uncle, or 1 per cent., as on a succession from a lineal ancestor? This House, differing from the Court of Session, took the latter view, and LORD CAMPBELL began his opinion with these observations:

B "In construing the statute on which the case depends we must bear in mind that it applies to the whole of the United Kingdom, and that the intention of the legislature must be understood to be that the like interests in property taken by succession should be subjected to the like duties, wheresoever the property may be situated. The technicalities of the laws of England and of Scotland, where they differ, must be disregarded, and the language of the legislature must be taken in its popular sense."

C The technicalities to be disregarded were not technical expressions in the Act, but, as LORD WENSLEYDALE I think very clearly points out, the technicalities of the law of real property outside the Act altogether. In the Act itself, so far as it came under consideration in that case, there were no technical expressions belonging to the law of either country. But outside the Act there was the technical rule of Scottish law by which each succeeding substitute takes the whole fee and must be served heir to the preceding owner.

D Since these remarks have been in print, I have had the advantage of reading the criticism passed upon them by the Lord Chancellor. I must say I am rather surprised to learn that in Lord Saltoun's Case (17) "the word which was in debate was 'predecessor'"; that "the turning point of the case" was the question, "whether that word was to receive its meaning according to technical application in Scottish law, or its more popular meaning"; and, moreover, that "it was with reference to that word 'predecessor' that LORD CAMPBELL's observations were made." It is no concern of mine to defend LORD CAMPBELL. For aught I know he may have supposed that the term "predecessor" was a technical expression with Scottish lawyers. But, even so, why should it be assumed that he thought its meaning open to debate in Lord Saltoun's Case (17)? The very Act before him defined the term "predecessor." The definition seems somewhat remote from the popular meaning of the word, and not less remote from any technical application of it that can be imagined. I am very sorry to differ from my noble and learned friend. I may be wrong. But I cannot help thinking that when you find a special meaning assigned to a particular word in an Act of Parliament you must abide by that meaning in construing the Act—you cannot add to it or take away from it—nor can you substitute anything else for it. And, therefore, with the utmost respect, I venture to doubt whether it would have been permissible in Lord Saltoun's Case (17) to have discussed the comparative merits of other meanings which the Act had not adopted. And certainly I have some difficulty in understanding how such a discussion, if permitted, could have presented or involved the turning point of the case.

E It seems to me that statutes which apply to Scotland as well as to England, and touch upon matters commonly dealt with in legal language, may be divided into three classes. Sometimes, but very rarely, all legal terms are carefully avoided, as in the Succession Duty Act. Sometimes in very recent statutes, as in the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and the Partnership Act, 1890, every legal term according to English law is immediately followed by its equivalent in Scottish legal phraseology; and where no exact equivalent is to be found, a neutral and non-legal expression is adopted. But in some cases certainly, and especially in the legislation of former days, the statute proclaims its origin, and speaks the language of an English lawyer, with some Scottish legal phrases thrown in rather casually. The Income Tax Acts, I think, fall within this class, though, no doubt, the Act of 1842 is less conspicuously English than its predecessors.

I How are you to approach the construction of such statutes? We are not, I think, quite without a guide. It seems to me that there is much good sense in what

LORD HARDWICKE says in his well-known letter to an eminent Scottish judge (see LORD KAMES' ELUCIDATIONS (Edn. 1800), p. 385). Incidentally he happens to deal with the very point. He observes that, where there are two countries with different systems of jurisprudence under one legislature, the expressions in statutes applying to both are almost always taken from the language or style of one, and do not harmonise equally with the genius or terms of both systems of law. That was, perhaps, rather a delicate way of stating the case, but one must remember to whom LORD HARDWICKE was writing, and his meaning is perfectly clear. Then he explains how the statutes ought to be expounded. You must, he says, as in other sciences, reason by analogy—that is, as I understand it, you must take the meaning of legal expressions from the law of the country to which they properly belong, and in any case arising in the sister country you must apply the statute in an analogous or corresponding sense, so as to make the operation and effect of the statute the same in both countries. Thus you get what LORD HARDWICKE calls “a consistent, sensible construction.” A simpler plan is now recommended. Though the words have a definite legal meaning in England, you must not, it is now said, look at that meaning unless it be in vogue north of the Tweed. You must put out the light you have, unless it penetrates directly to the furthest part of the room. That was not LORD HARDWICKE's view. He seems to have thought reflected light better than none.

In construing Acts of Parliament, it is a general rule, not without authority in this House (Stephenson v. Higginson (31)), that words must be taken in their legal sense unless a contrary intention appears. Is a contrary intention shown merely by the circumstances that the legal meaning of the words used belongs more properly, or even exclusively, to the jurisprudence of one part of Great Britain? Agreeing with LORD HARDWICKE rather than with the Court of Session, I am disposed to answer that question in the negative. That according to the law of England a technical meaning is attached to the word “charity,” and to the word “charitable” in such expressions as “charitable uses,” “charitable trusts,” or “charitable purposes,” cannot, I think, be denied. The Court of Chancery has always regarded with peculiar favour those trusts of a public nature which, according to the doctrine of the court derived from the piety of early times, are considered to be charitable. Charitable uses or trusts form a distinct head of equity. Their distinctive position is made the more conspicuous by the circumstance that, owing to their nature, they are not obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities, while a gift in perpetuity not being to a charity is void.

Whatever may have been the foundation of the jurisdiction of the court over this class of trusts, and whatever may have been the origin of the title by which these trusts are still known, no one I think who takes the trouble to investigate the question can doubt that the title was recognised, and the jurisdiction established before the Charitable Gifts Act, 1601, and quite independently of that Act. The object of that statute was merely to provide new machinery for the reformation of abuses in regard to charities. But by a singular construction it was held to authorise certain gifts to charity which otherwise would have been void. And it contained in the preamble a list of charities so varied and comprehensive that it became the practice of the court to refer to it as a sort of index or chart. At the same time it has never been forgotten that the “objects there enumerated,” as CRANWORTH, L.C., observes in London University v. Yarrow (32) (1 De G. & J. at p. 79), “are not to be taken as the only objects of charity, but are given as instances.” Courts of law, of course, had nothing to do with the administration of trusts. Originally, therefore, they were not concerned with charities at all. But after the passing of the Act 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, commonly known as the Statute of Mortmain, which avoided in certain cases gifts to “uses called charitable uses,” alienations and dispositions to charitable uses sometimes came under the cognisance of courts of law, and those courts, as they were bound to do, construed the words “charitable uses” in the sense recognised in the Court of Chancery, and in the statute of 1601, as their proper meaning.

A I have already dwelt for a moment on this point, because it seems to me that there is a disposition to treat the technical meaning of the term "charity" rather as the idiom of a particular court than as the language of the law of England. And yet, of all words in the English language bearing a popular as well as a legal signification, I am not sure that there is one which more unmistakably has a technical meaning in the strictest sense of the term, that is, a meaning clear and distinct

B peculiar to the law as understood and administered in this country, and not depending upon or coterminous with the popular or vulgar use of the word.

In Ireland, though neither the statute of Elizabeth nor the so-called Statute of Mortmain extended to that country, the legal and technical meaning of the term "charity" is precisely the same as it is in England. As regards the law of Scotland, the case is somewhat different. I think that FRY, L.J., with whose very able judgment in other respects I concur, has gone rather too far in saying that the word "charity" has the same technical meaning in Scotland which it has in England. On the other hand, it seems to me that, in Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate (1), the Court of Session has erred more seriously in the opposite direction. To borrow the words of LORD CHELMSFORD (Dundee Magistrates v. Morris (33), 3 Macq. at p. 154):

D "I cannot discover that there is any great dissimilarity between the law of Scotland, and the law of England with respect to charities."

And the result of such researches as I have been able to make is that, in the Scottish Act to which counsel for the respondent referred, the Act of 1633, in some statutes extending to Scotland, as in 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 115, a Roman Catholic Relief

E Act, and the Succession Duty Act, 1853, to which I have already referred, in some opinions, delivered by Scottish judges in Scotland, as in Ferguson v. Marjoribanks (23), and not unfrequently in this House, sitting as a Court of Scottish Appeal, as in Aberdeen University v. Irvine (25) and Andrews v. McGuffog (34), the words "charity" and "charitable" are used sometimes in the sense which they bear in English law, sometimes in a sense hardly distinguishable from it.

F If this conclusion is right, although the expression "charitable purposes" may not have acquired a technical meaning, properly so called, in the law of Scotland, I cannot see that the use of the expression in a general Act as a legal term without the addition of its equivalent according to Scottish law (if any such equivalent could be found) would of itself, and apart from other circumstances, either create surprise or lead to any practical difficulty. No doubt the popular meaning of the words "charity" and "charitable" does not coincide with their legal meaning; and no doubt it is easy enough to collect from the books a few decisions which seem to push the doctrine of the court to the extreme, and to present a contrast between the two meanings in an aspect almost ludicrous. But still it is difficult to fix the point of divergence, and no one as yet has succeeded in defining the popular meaning of the word "charity."

H The learned counsel for the Crown did not attempt the task. Even the paraphrase of the Master of the Rolls is not quite satisfactory. It would extend to every gift which the donor, with or without reason, might happen to think beneficial for the recipient; and to which he might be moved by the consideration that it was beyond the means of the object of his bounty to procure it for himself. That seems to me much too wide. If I may say so without offence, under conceivable circumstances, it might cover a trip to the Continent,

I or a box at the Opera. But how does it save Moravian missions? The Moravians are peculiarly zealous in missionary work. It is one of their distinguishing tenets. I think they would be surprised to learn that the substantial cause of their missionary zeal was an intention to assist the poverty of heathen tribes.

How far then, it may be asked, does the popular meaning of the word "charity" correspond with its legal meaning? "Charity" in its legal sense comprises four principal divisions: trusts for the relief of poverty; trusts for the advancement of education; trusts for the advancement of religion; and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community, not falling under any of the preceding heads. The trusts last referred to are not the less charitable in the eye of the law because incidentally they benefit the rich as well as the poor, as indeed every charity that deserves the name must do either directly or indirectly. It seems to me that a person of education, at any rate, if he were speaking as the Act is speaking with reference to endowed charities, would include in the category educational and religious charities, as well as charities for the relief of the poor. Roughly speaking, I think he would exclude the fourth division. Even there it is difficult to draw the line. A layman would probably be amused if he were told that a gift to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the benefit of the nation was a charity. Many people, I think, would consider a gift for the support of a lifeboat a charitable gift, though its object is not the advancement of religion, or the advancement of education, or the relief of the poor. And even a layman might take the same favourable view of a gratuitous supply of pure water for the benefit of a crowded neighbourhood; but after all, this is rather an academical discussion. If a gentleman of education, without legal training, were asked what is the meaning of "a trust for charitable purposes," I think he would most probably reply: "That sounds like a legal phrase. You had better ask a lawyer."

Having attempted to clear the ground so far, I come to the words of the enactment, on which the question before the House depends. They are to be found in the Income Tax Act, 1842. By s. 61 of that Act it is provided that, under Sched. A certain allowances are to be made for the duties charged on colleges or halls in the universities, and on any hospital, public school, or almshouse in respect of their public buildings, offices, and premises. The allowances are to be granted by the Commissioners for General Purposes in their respective districts. Then allowances are to be made "on the rents and profits of lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages belonging to any hospital, public school, or almshouse, or vested in trustees for charitable purposes, so far as the same are applied to charitable purposes."

These allowances are in the hands of quite a different body. They are to be granted

"on proof before the Commissioners for Special Purposes of the due application of the said rents and profits to charitable purposes only, and in so far as the same shall be applied to charitable purposes only."

They are

"to be claimed and proved by any steward, agent, or factor acting for such school, hospital, or almshouse, or other trust for charitable purposes, or by any trustee of the same by affidavit . . . stating the amount of the duties chargeable, and the application thereof," and are to be carried into effect by the special commissioners without altering the assessments which are to be levied notwithstanding such allowances. By s. 88 it is provided, with respect to Sched. C, that exemption shall be given to

"the stock or dividends of any corporation, fraternity, or society of persons, or of any trust established for charitable purposes only, or which according to the rules or regulations established by Act of Parliament, charter, decree, deed of trust, or will, shall be applicable by the said corporation, fraternity, or society, or by any trustee to charitable purposes only, and in so far as the same shall be applied to charitable purposes only, or the stock or dividends in the names of any trustees applicable solely to the repairs of any cathedral, college, church, or chapel, or any building used solely for the purpose of Divine worship, and in so far as the same shall be applied to such purposes, provided the application thereof to such purposes shall be duly proved before the said Commissioners for Special Purposes by any agent or factor on the behalf of any such corporation, fraternity, or society, or by any of the members or trustees."

A Section 98 contains directions as to the manner in which these claims of exemption are to be made and carried into effect. Section 105 provides, by reference to the provisions of Sched. C, for similar exemptions under Sched. D, in the case of "any corporation, fraternity, or society of persons, and any trustee for charitable purposes only." In the case of the British Museum, s. 149 provides for the like allowances under Sched. A, "as are granted to colleges and other properties mentioned in No. 6 of that schedule," and the like exemptions in respect of any dividends of stock, "as are granted to charitable institutions" in the Act. Section 188 enacts that every provision applied to the duties in any particular schedule, which is also applicable to the duties in any other schedule, and not repugnant to its provisions, shall be applied as fully and effectually as if the application thereof had been expressly directed.

C What is the meaning of the expression "charitable purposes," as used in the Act of 1842? In order to determine that question, it is necessary, I think, to consider what the Act is speaking about, and whom it is speaking to. It does not help one much to take the word "charity" nakedly, and in the abstract, and then to turn to dictionaries for its meaning. It is said that the most common signification of "charity" is conveyed by the word "alms." So it is when that meaning fits the context, or the occasion. Perhaps, by way of illustrating my meaning, I may be permitted to refer to a passage in the writings of one of the most popular authors of the last century, where a striking contrast is drawn between charity, in its vulgar sense, and a gift for purposes which the law of England, rightly or wrongly—wrongly, as some think—considers charitable. In one of his essays, GOLDSMITH tells the story of a French priest at Rheims, so miserly in his habits, that he went E by the name of "The Griper." Working incessantly in his vineyard, steadily refusing to relieve distress, he managed to save a large sum of money. Then the writer adds:

F "This good man had long perceived the wants of the poor in the city, particularly in having no water but what they were obliged to buy at an advanced price; wherefore, that whole fortune which he had been amassing he laid out in an aqueduct, by which he did the poor more useful and lasting service than if he had distributed his whole income in charity every day at his door."

No one can misunderstand the meaning of the word there.

But the Act of 1842 has nothing to do with casual almsgiving or charity of that sort. Nor indeed has it anything to do with charity which is not protected by a G trust of a permanent character. The provisions of the Act which your Lordships have to consider are concerned with the revenues of established institutions—the income of charitable endowments. Such endowments, as I have already pointed out, form, according to English law, a distinct class of trusts standing by themselves, and owing their validity in each case, if the trust is a perpetuity, to the fact that the purposes are charitable in the eye of the law. Then I ask: To whom is H the Act speaking? In one sense, no doubt, it is speaking to all concerned; but it is addressed, I think, specially to that body under whose "cognisance and jurisdiction," to use the words of the Act, these particular allowances and exemptions are placed. All applications for these allowances and exemptions are to be made, not to the general commissioners in their respective districts, but to the special commissioners, and "at the head office for stamps and taxes in England." This is an I express direction with reference to exemptions under Sched. C, and, having regard to s. 188, the same rule must hold good in all cases, so that in no case can the question come along before any board or any commissioners in Scotland. Practically the special commissioners are identical with the Board of Inland Revenue, who now represent the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes named in the Act of 1842. How are the authorities at Somerset House to determine what constitutes a trust for charitable purposes? The majority of the Court of Appeal tell them they must be guided by the popular meaning of "charity," and that "each individual case must be decided on its own facts." There is certainly no indication in the Act that such a hopeless task as that was laid on the special commissioners. They have to satisfy themselves that the income in respect of which exemption is claimed is applied solely to charitable purposes, and they are told how that is to be proved. But the question, charity or no charity, if you accept the contention of the respondent, is determined for them by the law of the country in which they sit to exercise their jurisdiction. In Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate (1), the Lord President observed that such a construction "would have a most disturbing and confusing effect." With the utmost deference, it seems to me the only way to ensure uniformity in the administration of the Act.

On these grounds I have come to the conclusion that the expression "trust for charitable purposes" in the Act of 1842, and the other expressions in the Act in which the word "charitable" occurs, must be construed in their technical meaning according to English law. Although I rest my opinion on these broad grounds, it is I think, satisfactory to find that every consideration to which the case has given rise, if examined closely, confirms this view, and that there is no indication in the Act pointing in the opposite direction. In the first place, it is plain on the very words of Sched. A, that the legislature considered the purposes of a public school to be charitable, and a public school to be a trust for charitable purposes, just as much as an almshouse or a hospital. This seems to me to be enough to displace the narrow view of the Court of Session. Then, as Fry, L.J., points out, every expression in the first provision which I have read from Sched. A is a legal expression. But the argument may be carried further. Turn to the parallel passage in the Act of 1806 from which the Act of 1842 is copied. There the words are "on the rents and profits of messuages, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, belonging to any hospital, public school, or almshouse, or vested in trustees for charitable purposes, so far as the same are applied to charitable purposes."

In that passage every expression is a legal expression, and what is more to the purpose, a legal expression according to English law. There is no trace of Scottish legal phraseology there. I am not sure that the omission of the word "messuages" and the introduction of the word "heritages" may not have had something to do with creating the difficulty which your Lordships have now to solve. It seems to me, too, that the expressions in Sched. C "decree, deed of trust, or will" more properly belong to English legal phraseology than to Scottish. "Deed of trust" indeed is common to the legal language of both countries. But the word "decree" I think points primarily to the decrees of the Court of Chancery, by which no small proportion of the charities in this kingdom have been established, and I rather doubt whether the word "will" would have been used there as it is, if due attention had been paid to the language of Scottish lawyers.

There was an argument which appears to have had great weight with one of the learned judges in the Court of Session, to which I cannot attach much importance. That learned judge points out that in Sched. C there is a special exemption in favour of funds dedicated to the repair of cathedrals, colleges, churches, and places of worship. From that he infers that such purposes are not charitable within the meaning of the Act, and so, "without going outside of Sched. C," he finds a construction conclusive, as he thinks, in favour of the claim of the Crown. But, my Lords, in construing any document, it is not well to confine your attention to an isolated passage. It seems to me to be necessary to go outside of Sched. C in order to understand the Act. If you turn to Sched. A, and Sched. D, you will observe that these special exemptions are not to be found in either. So that, if that learned judge is right, we have this singular result. If property devoted to these special purposes is in land, income tax attaches. If the land is taken by a railway company and there is an interim investment in consols, or if the property is in any government funds, home, foreign, or colonial, it is exempt; in any other form of investment it is subject to income tax. Why should a premium be offered for the investment of money intended for church repairs in the funds of foreign or colonial governments? A construction which leads to a result so whimsical ought

A not, I think, to be adopted without good reason. It is not so very uncommon in an Act of Parliament to find special exemptions which are already covered by a general exemption. Nor is surplusage or even tautology wholly unknown in the language of the legislature. On the other hand, if the legal meaning of the expression "charitable purposes" be adopted, there may be a superfluous expression here or there, but the Act will be consistent throughout. No argument can, I think, be founded on the special exemption of the British Museum. The clause relating to the Museum, which is also to be found in the Act of 1806, is obviously out of its place, and was probably introduced at the instance of the trustees of the Museum. It was necessary as regards the buildings and premises in the actual occupation of the Museum chargeable under Sched. A, and, that being so, it was natural, and not, I think, improper, that the exemptions to which the Museum would be entitled, as a charitable institution, under Sched. C, should be also specially mentioned.

A strong confirmation of the view which I am presenting to your Lordships is, I think, furnished by the income tax section of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855. The Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, which established the Charity Commission, provided for the transfer of charitable funds to official trustees, of whom the secretary to the Commission was one. It appears from a parliamentary paper ("Charities," 1865), which contains a correspondence between the Board of Inland Revenue as Special Commissioners of Income Tax, and the Treasury, on the subject of income tax on charities, that it was the practice of the Board to give exemption to all stock standing in the names of the official trustees of charitable funds without further inquiry. This practice was confirmed, and the principle was carried still further by the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855, which enacts (s. 28) that

"all dividends arising from any stock in the public funds standing in the names of the official trustees of charitable funds, and which shall be certified by the Board [that is, the Charity Commissioners] to the governor and company of the Bank of England to be exempt from the property or income tax, shall be paid or carried to the banking account of the official trustees, without any deduction of such tax, and all dividends arising from any stock in the public funds standing in any other names or name, and which the Board shall certify to the governor and company of the Bank of England to be subject only to charitable trusts, and to be exempt from such tax, shall be paid without any deduction thereof."

By virtue of this enactment the income of a large proportion of the funds devoted to charity in this country, exceeding in amount for the year 1865 one million and a half, and now probably much larger, was entirely withdrawn from the cognisance and jurisdiction of the Board of Inland Revenue. Thenceforth, for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts, as well as for the purposes of administration, that income has been under the jurisdiction of a body bound by law to construe the expression "charitable trusts" according to its legal meaning, and to give certificates of exemption in accordance with that construction. The obligation is clear. The Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855, is to be construed as one Act with the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, and the Act of 1853 contains a definition of "charity" by reference to the Act of Elizabeth, and the practice of the Court of Chancery. I may add that s. 28 of the Act of 1855 has always formed part of the income tax code whenever the tax has been re-imposed, carrying with it into the code, to a certain extent at least, the legal definition of "charity."

I cannot help reminding your Lordships, in conclusion, that the Income Tax Act is not a statute which was passed once for all. It has expired, and has been revived, and re-enacted over and over again; every revival and re-enactment is a new Act. It is impossible to suppose that on every occasion the legislature can have been ignorant of the manner in which the tax was being administered by a department of the State under the guidance of their legal advisers, especially when the practice was fully laid before Parliament in the correspondence to which I have referred ("Charities," 1865). It seems to me that an argument in favour of the respondent might have been founded on this view of the case. The point, of course, is not that a continuous practice following legislation interprets the mind of the legislature, but that when you find legislation following a continuous practice and repeating the very words on which that practice was founded, it may perhaps fairly be inferred that the legislature, in re-enacting the statute, used those words in their received meaning. And perhaps it might be argued that the inference grows stronger with each successive re-enactment. However, as the point was not dealt with at the Bar, I forbear to express any opinion upon it.

With the policy of taxing charities I have nothing to do. It may be right, or it may be wrong; but, speaking for myself, I am not sorry to be compelled to give my voice for the respondent. To my mind it is rather startling to find the established practice of so many years suddenly set aside by an administrative department of their own motion, and after something like an assurance given to Parliament that no change would be made without the interposition of the legislature. In 1865 the Treasury communicated to Parliament the fact that they had come to the conclusion that the subject was "one which should be reserved to be dealt with by the legislature, and that in the meantime the practice which has hitherto prevailed should be followed." For such a conclusion, even if the claim of the Crown had been originally well-founded, there would be much to be said. The legislature declaring the law can at the same time grant immunity for the past; but a change of practice, established by judicial decision only, would leave the bulk of the charitable foundations in this country exposed to liabilities appalling in amount. I am, therefore, glad to find that the claim of the Crown is based on what seems to me to be a very superficial view of the meaning of the legislature, and my opinion is that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD MORRIS.—I have had an opportunity of reading and fully considering the opinion which has just now been announced by LORD MACNAGHTEN, and I can only add that I concur unreservedly in the reasons he has given and in the result he has arrived at.

Husband and Wife—Consortium—Right of consortium—Refusal of wife to live with husband—Husband's right to seize and confine her—Right to beat wife.

A husband has no right to take the person of his wife by force and keep her in confinement in order to prevent her from absenting herself from him for any purpose however innocent of moral offence until she renders to him conjugal rights.

Re Cochrane (1) (1840), 8 Dowl. 630, overruled.

Quære whether a husband has the right to restrain his wife if he found her about immediately to do something which would be to his dishonour, e.g., if she were about to elope with another or going to meet a paramour.

PET LORD ESHER, M.R.: One proposition that has been referred to is that a husband has a right to beat his wife. I do not believe this ever was the law.

Appeal from a decision of a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division (CAVE, J., and JEUNE, J.) refusing a writ of habeas corpus to a married woman, Emily Maude Jackson, who was alleged to be illegally detained by her husband, Edmund Haughton Jackson. A

Finlay, Q.C., moved in the Court of Appeal for the writ by way of appeal from the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, and also as an original motion. The writ was ordered to issue, and the return to the writ was made in the following terms: B

"I, Edmund Haughton Jackson, in obedience to the writ herewith, do certify and return as follows: 1. The said Emily Emma Maude Jackson is my wife. 2. During my absence in New Zealand in the year 1888 my said wife went to reside with her sisters and brother-in-law. It was arranged that she should shortly join me in New Zealand, but she wrote to me pressing me to return to England, and I did so, but on my return to England in July, 1888, she refused to live with me, and I was denied access to her. 3. I commenced proceedings in the Divorce Division of the High Court of Justice against my said wife for restitution of conjugal rights, and on July 30, 1889, a decree was made for such restitution. 4. Since the making of such decree I have endeavoured to persuade my said wife by letters (personal access being still denied me) to come and live with me, but, acting under the advice and counsel of her said sisters and brother-in-law, she has in no way responded to my overtures. 5. I, therefore, on Mar. 8 instant, took my said wife and have since detained her in my house, using no more force or constraint than was necessary to take her or to prevent her returning to her said relations. She has had perfect liberty in and the full run of the house, short of leaving it. 6. Such restraint, I submit, I could lawfully use in order to have an opportunity of regaining the affection of my wife which had become alienated from me, and which it was impossible I could do when she was under the influence of her said relations." C

In his affidavit Mr. Jackson stated that his wife was a woman of independent means, and that he was married to her on Nov. 5, 1887, contrary to the wishes of her relatives. With his wife's consent he went to New Zealand two days after the marriage, on the understanding that she would follow him there later on. Mrs. Jackson wrote to him shortly afterwards to come back, but when he returned she refused to live with him, and he was not allowed access to her. On July 30, 1889, he obtained against her a decree for restitution of conjugal rights which she refused to obey. On Sunday, Mar. 8, 1891, with the help of two friends, Mr. Dixon Robinson and Dr. W. H. Robinson, he seized her as she was leaving church at Clitheroe, in Lancashire. In obtaining possession of her they used no violence, but only such force as was necessary to separate her from her sister, Mrs. Baldwin, to whom she was clinging, and to get her into the deponent's carriage. He then drove with her to his house at Blackburn. The affidavit continued: D

"After the carriage started, my wife offered no further resistance, though she continuously protested against having been taken, and desired to be released, saying that I could not force her to live with me. On arriving at the house she walked quietly in without any use of force whatever. My friend Dixon Robinson drove with us to Blackburn inside the carriage, and later in the day we were joined by Dr. Robinson, who was my other coadjutor in the seizure of my wife. Immediately on my arrival home I placed my wife in the charge of my sister who now resides with me, with instructions to give her every attention, and I also engaged the services of a qualified nurse. . . . Until about seven o'clock on Sunday evening my wife refused all refreshment of any description, but ultimately consented to take some light refreshment, insisting however, in regard to every thing she took, that my friend Dr. Robinson should share it with her, as she feared it might be drugged. After the nurse came, however, she appeared to regain confidence, and since the Monday after her capture she has freely partaken of any food set before her." E

A He then stated that Dr. Martin, his medical attendant, had been in daily attendance on her, though she had been very well, and continued :

B "During the whole period since the seizure of my wife she has been treated by myself and everyone in the house with every kindness and consideration, and I cannot remember to have said or done a cruel, unkind, or ungentlemanly word or act to her during the whole time. . . . Since Wednesday last my wife has had the free run of the house, doing just as she pleased (save leaving the house, had she so desired), but declining to come downstairs till the evening. I have moreover several times offered to take her a drive with me, but she has declined. On one occasion only were the blinds of her room upstairs pulled down to prevent her exchanging signals with her relatives outside, and they were drawn up a few moments afterwards, and no restraint or interference was subsequently placed upon her so seeing or communicating with her relatives."

C Mrs. Baldwin, Mrs. Jackson's sister, filed an affidavit in which, referring to the seizure of the wife on Mar. 8, she stated :

D "Mr. Jackson had his face almost covered with a black wrap which went over his nose. He rushed at my sister and seized her by the arm and said : 'You are my wife, come with me into this carriage.' She said : 'I will not,' and then said to me : 'Hold me fast and prevent him taking me.' I caught hold of her waist. He was accompanied by two young men named Robinson, one a surgeon, the other a solicitor's articled clerk. A struggle ensued, they endeavouring to force her into the carriage, she resisting with all her might, and I assisting her to the utmost of my power. Eventually she was dragged backwards into the bottom of the carriage by her husband, I clinging to her all the time. He then bent back with great violence two of the fingers of my right hand, and so loosened my grip round her waist. When my hands were being thus loosened, Dixon Robinson (the articled clerk) pushed me violently on the right shoulder, and I fell back from the carriage. My sister's legs were sticking out of the carriage when she was on the bottom of the carriage, and Dixon Robinson, after pushing me away, got hold of her legs and shoved them into the carriage and jumped in, and immediately drove away with her. The struggle took place in the full view of the congregation coming out of church. She resisted going with him to the utmost of her power, and struggled violently against him, and was only taken away by main force."

E F G H Dixon Robinson in his affidavit said that he helped Mr. Jackson to separate Mrs. Jackson and Mrs. Baldwin, and to put Mrs. Jackson into the carriage, and that no more force was used than was absolutely necessary. He also stated that he did not see Mrs. Jackson again till the Tuesday after the capture, but he remained in the house until Mar. 14, and during that time he had never seen the slightest approach to cruelty. Mr. Jackson always treated his wife with the greatest kindness and consideration. Dr. Robinson, who was in the house until Mar. 14, also stated that he repeatedly saw Mrs. Jackson during that time, and she was always treated kindly, and, except on the Sunday when he removed her from the room, he never saw anything on Mr. Jackson's part which had even the appearance of force.

I Dr. Martin stated in his affidavit that when he first saw Mrs. Jackson on the Sunday evening he found her suffering from excitement and exhaustion, having had no food since breakfast. The only complaint she made was that her husband when he got in had rudely taken her bonnet off and thrown it on the fire. He found also an extensive bruise on her arm, which, she said, was done while they were struggling to get her into the carriage. He had attended her since, and, though she suffered from fits of depression, she had kept up very well, and so far, he thought, her health had not suffered. He had observed no symptoms of harsh treatment, and she seemed to have been treated with every consideration. The nurse made an affidavit to the same effect.

Mrs. Jackson made no affidavit, as she had no opportunity, her solicitor having been refused access to her when he had applied for it.

Henn Collins, Q.C. (Malcolm Douglas with him), for Mr. Jackson: I submit that the husband has done nothing more than what he has at common law a right to do, namely, have possession of his wife and keep her to prevent her escaping from him. This is the law as laid down by COLERIDGE, J., in Re Cochrane (1), in which he refers to BACON'S ABRIDGMENT, tit. "Baron and Feme," B., and also says (8 Dowl. at p. 636) that "for the happiness and honour of both parties [the law] places the wife under the guardianship of the husband, and entitles him, for the sake of both, to protect her from the danger of unrestrained intercourse with the world by enforcing cohabitation and a common residence."

A husband may confine his wife in his house; that is not the same thing as imprisoning her, and there is no need for him to justify his using restraint by showing that the wife would make a bad use of her liberty: R. v. Lister (2). If the wife will not promise to abstain from misconduct, or if the husband thinks she is not to be trusted, he may confine her. In Manby v. Scott it is said that,

"although our law makes a wife subject to her husband, yet the husband may not put her to death, but this shall be murder; neither can he beat her, but the wife may swear the peace against him."

LORD MANSFIELD has said:

"A husband has, in consequence of his marriage, a right to the custody of his wife; and whoever detains her from him violates that right; and he has a right to seize her wherever he finds her."

In that case a writ was refused because there had been an agreement for separation made between the husband and wife: R. v. Mead. The right of the husband to the custody of his wife is shown also in other cases: Atwood v. Atwood; Seymour's Case; Lady Lee's Case. It is impossible to give exact grounds when a husband may exert his right; in each case the circumstances must be different. But the result of the cases is that the husband may confine his wife in his house and even use such violence as may reasonably be necessary to restrain her. The evidence here shows that no unnecessary cruelty or violence has been used by Mr. Jackson. Section 2 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, [which provided that a decree of restitution of conjugal rights should no longer be enforced by attachment] has not affected the right of a husband; it merely took away the power that the court formerly had of enforcing the restitution of conjugal rights by attachment. [R. v. Leggatt (3) was also referred to.]

Finlay, Q.C., and Forbes Lankester, in support of the writ.—The distinction which is suggested between confinement and imprisonment does not exist. Every confinement is legally an imprisonment. The contention amounts to giving the husband the right to condemn his wife to perpetual imprisonment; to saying that he is to be judge and executioner in his own cause. Such a contention is monstrous. The old authorities are barbarous and obsolete. Re Cochrane (1) was overruled by R. v. Leggatt (3), or if it was not, it should be overruled now. If the law is as contended for, what was the use of a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights? In cases of intended serious misconduct, such as if a wife was about to elope with another man, a husband might no doubt temporarily restrain his wife, but here the wife was not guilty of any such thing. It has been stated that if a husband restrained his wife's personal liberty a habeas corpus would be granted: R. v. Middleton. They also cited Lord Vane's Case.

Henn Collins, Q.C., in reply, referred to 1 Hale P.C. 629.

Their Lordships saw Mrs. Jackson in camera, and then delivered the following judgments.

A LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—The court has satisfied itself from what Mrs. Jackson has said that, in refusing to stay in her husband's house, she has been acting entirely of her own free will, and has not been forced either to refuse to stay or to remain where she was before he carried her away.

B I confess that some of the propositions which have been referred to in the course of the argument are such as I am reluctant to think could ever have been the law of England. Little more than a century ago it was boldly contended that slavery existed in England; but, if such a contention were put forward now, it would be regarded with ridicule. In the same way I should think that such quaint and absurd dicta as are to be found in the books as to the right of a husband over his wife in the matter of personal chastisement are not now capable of being cited as authorities in this or any civilised country. It is important to bear this in mind, because with these old dicta are bound up many statements as to the rights of a husband over his wife of a more moderate and humane character. The only justification, as it appears to me, for some of these expressions is to be found in the interpretation put on the word "castigatio" by LORD HALE, who suggests that it means not personal violence but admonition only. Whether that interpretation can be borne out I cannot say, but I am glad that someone, even in that early age, attempted to show how such an alleged power in the husband to chastise his wife personally might be got rid of.

E It seems to me that all the authorities relied upon for the husband are tainted with some notion of the husband's absolute dominion over his wife. The only case in which, as a question of abstract law, a husband was held to have a right to the custody of his wife was Cochrane's Case (1). But with regard to the contention that the mere relation of husband and wife, apart from any right of restraint arising from her misconduct, gives a husband complete dominion over his wife's person, I know of no authority establishing such a proposition. I do not mean to lay down as law that there may not be some acts of the wife, proximate to acts of misconduct, which may give the husband some right of physical interference with her freedom; just as he, or anyone else, might restrain her if for instance, she were out of her mind and were going to throw herself out of the window. So, if a husband found his wife on the staircase just going to elope with someone, he might have some right to restrain her. It is not necessary, however, to consider that question any further on the present occasion, and I will only say that I can understand that some such authority on the part of the husband might well be justified as reasonable in any system of law.

G We have to consider the return to this writ. That return states the refusal of the wife to live with her husband, and that in consequence of the refusal he has taken her and detained her in his house, using no more force or constraint than was necessary to take her and prevent her from returning to her relations. That is the return by which he attempts to justify the admitted imprisonment of this lady. I do not know that I can express in sufficiently precise language the distinction which has been suggested between "imprisonment" and "confinement"; but, if there be any, I can only say that in this case I should find that there has been an imprisonment of the lady in her husband's house. Looking at the return, it appears to me to be based on the broad proposition that where a wife has wilfully absented herself from her husband he has the right to seize her by force and detain her until she shall be willing to restore to him his conjugal rights. I cannot assent to that proposition. The legislature, by s. 2 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, has deprived the matrimonial court of the power to enforce by imprisonment a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights; and the contention now put forward on behalf of the husband is that, whereas the court had only the power to send a wife to prison in the ordinary way for contempt in disobeying a decree for restitution of conjugal rights, and that power is now taken away, yet a husband may himself, of his own motion, where his wife has withdrawn from the conjugal consortium, seize and imprison her until she consents to restore him his rights. I am of opinion that no such right or power exists or ever did exist. Whatever authority there may be for such a proposition, this qualification will always be found to be imported, that where the wife complains, or has a reasonable apprehension, of violence or ill-usage, the court will never interfere to compel her to return to her husband.

Coming now to the circumstances of the case before us, I am prepared to base my judgment on this, that no English subject has a right to imprison, of his own motion, another English subject—whether his wife or anyone else—who is sui juris, and of age, but, assuming that there were such a right, it would be subject to the qualification I have just mentioned of reasonable apprehension of violence or ill-usage, and on the facts of this case I am of opinion that the court has ample grounds for refusing to allow Mr. Jackson to retain the custody of his wife. It seems to have been thought that the husband's rights are subject only to the question of the exact amount of force or violence used in enforcing them. But is it nothing that a lady coming out of church on a Sunday is to be seized by three men in the face of the congregation, and forcibly put into a carriage and driven off? Is not the insult involved in such a proceeding to be considered? Then there is the complaint of the husband's tearing off the bonnet and throwing it into the fire. That incident is related in one of the affidavits filed on behalf of the husband, and no explanation of it is given. I confess I regard with something like indignation the statement of the facts of this case, and the absence on the part of the husband of delicacy and respect towards the wife whom he has sworn to love and cherish.

I am unwilling to look at the earlier part of the narrative as set out in the husband's affidavit, and for this reason. It is true that his statements, standing unqualified and uncontradicted, do make out a case in his favour, and show that the lady was married to him voluntarily, and not under circumstances which reflect any discredit on him; but I do not know how far these statements are to be trusted, inasmuch as the wife has not been allowed to communicate with any legal adviser so as to give her an opportunity of saying how far she agrees with them. I do not say the statements should be disbelieved, but I cannot rely upon them. The result is, in my opinion, that there is no power given by law to a husband such as is claimed here, and if there were such a power, then upon the facts of this case I think the wife has reasonable grounds to apprehend violence in the future. On either ground the return to the writ is bad, and the lady must be restored to her liberty.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case it is admitted that the lady is physically confined by her husband, so as to take away her liberty. The only question for us to determine is whether we can allow that to continue. The husband declares his intention to continue it. He justifies the detention, and the proposition laid down on his behalf is that a husband has a right to take the person of his wife by force and keep her in confinement in order to prevent her from absenting herself from him so as to deprive him of her society.

A series of propositions have been quoted which, if true, make an English wife the abject slave of her husband. One proposition that has been referred to is that a husband has a right to beat his wife. I do not believe this ever was the law. Then it was said that, if a wife was extravagant, the husband might confine her, though he could not imprison her. The confinement there spoken of was clearly the deprivation of her liberty to go where she pleased. The counsel for the husband was obliged to admit that, if she was kept to one room, that would be imprisonment; but he argued that, if she was only kept in the house, that would be confinement only. That is a refinement too great for my intellect. I should say that confining a person to one house was imprisonment, just as much as confining that person to one room. I do not believe that this contention is the law, or ever was.

It was said that by the law of England a husband has the custody of his wife. What must be meant by "custody" in that proposition so used to us? It must

A mean the same sort of custody as a gaoler has of a prisoner. I protest that there is no such law in England. Cochrane's Case (1) was cited as deciding that the husband has the right to such a custody of his wife. I have read it carefully, and I think that it does so decide. The judgment, if I may respectfully say so, is not very carefully worded, and uses different expressions in many places where it means the same thing; but that seems to me the result of it. It appears to me, B if I am right in attributing to it the meaning I have mentioned, that the decision in that case was wrong as to the law enunciated in it, and that it ought to be overruled. Sitting here, in the Court of Appeal, we are entitled to overrule it.

I do not believe that an English husband has by law any such rights over his wife's person as have been suggested. I do not say that there may not be occasions on which he would have a right of restraint, though not of imprisonment. C For instance, if a wife were about immediately to do something which would be to the dishonour of her husband—as if the husband saw his wife in the act of going to meet a paramour—I think that he might seize her and pull her back. That is not the right which is contended for in this case. The right now contended for is that he may imprison his wife by way of punishment; or, if he thinks that she is going to absent herself from him, for any purpose however innocent of moral offence, he may imprison her; and it must go to the full length that he may perpetually D imprison her. I do not think that this is the law of England.

But, assuming that there is such a right, the question arises whether the way in which, and the circumstances under which, it has been exercised in this case are such that the law ought to give back to the husband the custody of this lady against her will. The seizure was made on a Sunday afternoon when she was coming out E of church in the face of the whole congregation. He takes with him to assist him in making the seizure a young lawyer's clerk and another man. The wife is taken by the shoulders and dragged into a carriage and falls on the floor of the carriage, with her legs hanging out of the door. These have to be lifted in by, I believe, the clerk. Her arm is bruised in the struggle. She is then driven off to the husband's house, the lawyer's clerk riding in the carriage with them. Could anything be more insulting? F The lawyer's clerk remains at the house, and a nurse is engaged to attend to the wife, who is not ill. Obviously the lawyer's clerk and the nurse are to help to keep watch over her and control her. That in itself is insulting. She goes to a window in the house, and, one of her relations being outside, the blind is immediately pulled down.

I think that the circumstances of this seizure and detention were those of G extreme insult, and I cannot think that it can be that under such circumstances as these the husband has a right to keep his wife insultingly imprisoned till she undertakes to consort with him. In my opinion the circumstances are such that the court ought not to give her back into his custody. He has obtained, it is true, a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights, but that gives him no power to take the law into his own hands and himself enforce the decree of the court by imprisonment. Formerly that decree might have been enforced by attachment for H contempt, but that would have been imprisonment by the court, not by the husband. The power of attachment in such cases is now taken away [by s. 2 of Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884]. The suggestion, therefore, must be that, though the court has no power to force the wife to restore conjugal rights by imprisonment, the husband himself has a right to take her by force and imprison her without the assistance of the court. I think that the passing of the Act of Parliament which I took away the power of attachment in such cases is the strongest possible evidence to show that the legislature had no idea that a power would remain in the husband to imprison the wife for himself; and this tends to show that it is not, and never was, the law of England that the husband has such a right of seizing and imprisoning his wife as contended for in this case. If there is now a greater difficulty than there was in enforcing, or if it is now impossible to enforce effectively, a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights, the legislature has caused this by Act of Parliament, and the legislature must deal with the matter. For these reasons

I agree that the return to the writ is bad, and that the husband has so acted that we ought not to give back to him the custody of this lady. A

FRY, L.J.—The return to the writ raises the question whether a husband has by the law of England, when his wife refuses to live with him, a right to capture and confine her until she renders to him conjugal rights. The affirmative of this proposition was contended for by the counsel for the husband. B

The proposition divides itself into two parts, one having regard to the right to capture, the other to the right to confine. With regard to the alleged right to capture there does not appear to me to be a rag of authority in favour of such a right. No authority even of the oldest times was cited in support of such a right. Cochrane's Case (1) did not relate to the right of capture, but to the right of the husband to confine or imprison the wife until she rendered to him conjugal rights. C That case occurred in 1840, and no earlier authority was cited in it for the proposition that the husband had such a right except the passage in BACON'S ABRIDGMENT which affirms that

"the husband has power and dominion over the wife, and may keep her by force within the bounds of duty." D

That proposition is so vague that it cannot be considered satisfactory authority, and it is directly at variance with the decision in R. v. Lister (2), where it is said that the husband may restrain the wife on certain grounds, such as that she was spending his estate and consorting with lewd company, and that those are the only grounds on which he may restrain his wife. I cannot under these circumstances consider that Cochrane's Case (1) is a satisfactory authority. I cannot overlook the consideration that similar cases must have occurred over and over again, but the habitual course of practice has been to have recourse to the ecclesiastical court, and to obtain a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights; and no case is to be found by which it is established that such a right as that contended for by the husband in this case is given by the law of England. After Cochrane's Case (1) came R. v. Leggatt (3), which, to say the least, weakens the authority of Cochrane's Case (1). It is there said by CAMPBELL, C.J., that the husband has no such custody of his wife as a parent has of a child. E

Therefore, if the matter rested there, I should say it was clear that by law there was no such right as is contended for by the husband. But, assuming that the matter was doubtful at the time of the passing of the Act of 1884 with regard to the practice of the Matrimonial Causes Court, I say that it is doubtful no longer. F That Act, by s. 2, deprived the court of the power to enforce a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights by attachment, and substituted for that power two things: it gave power in the case of both husband and wife to order certain pecuniary allowances, and it further provided that non-compliance with the decree for the restitution of conjugal rights should be deemed to amount to desertion without reasonable cause. These provisions are substituted for the old power to enforce the decree by attachment. G I cannot think that, after the legislature has taken away the right of the court to enforce restitution of conjugal rights by attachment, the husband has any right of imprisonment in a case in which he is at once a party, the judge, and the executioner, or that he can enforce such restitution by himself imprisoning the wife without the assistance of the court. H

I confine myself to determining the precise question which is raised by this return, and I prefer not to diverge into the consideration of other questions more or less cognate to this. I do not think it necessary for the present purpose to advert to the older authorities on those questions which have been cited to us, beyond saying that I do not regard them with exactly the same feeling as the Master of the Rolls, nor think that all our predecessors on the judgment-seat were deficient in good sense. I also prefer to abstain from expressing an opinion as to the personal conduct of the husband in this transaction, and I do not make any view of his conduct any part of the grounds of my decision. I do not think that I

A it is possible to arrive at a just conclusion on these matters without further knowledge of the circumstances which led up to the transaction. There may or may not have been matters which might more or less furnish excuses for what was done on both sides, but, for the reasons which have been indicated by the Lord Chancellor, it seems to me to be unsafe to rely upon any view of matters the history of which is not fully before us. I agree in the result at which the Lord Chancellor

B and the Master of the Rolls have arrived, on the ground that the right set up by the husband does not exist by the law of England.

F Negligence—Defence—Volenti non fit injuria—Risk created or enhanced by employer's negligence—Safe system of work not provided—Continuance by employee in employment.

G When an employee undertakes to do work which is intrinsically dangerous notwithstanding that reasonable care has been taken to render it as little dangerous as possible he voluntarily subjects himself to the risks inevitably accompanying it, and, if he suffers, the doctrine of volenti non fit injuria is open to his employer in defence to any claim made by him. But where a risk to the employee has been created or enhanced by the negligence of the employer in not providing a safe system of work the mere continuance by the employee in his service with knowledge of the risk does not preclude the employee, if he suffer from such negligence, from recovering in respect of the employer's breach of duty. Whatever the dangers of the employment which

H the employee undertakes, among them is not to be numbered the risk of the employer's negligence and the creation or enhancement of danger thereby engendered, unless the employee specially agrees to take that risk.

I Per LORD WATSON: At common law a master who employs a servant in work of a dangerous character is bound to take all reasonable precautions for the workman's safety. He is no less responsible to his workman for injuries occasioned by a defective system of using machinery and his failing to see that it is properly used than for injuries caused by a defect in the machinery itself. An arrangement of machinery and tackle which, although reasonably safe for those engaged in working it, is nevertheless dangerous to workmen employed in another department of the business constitutes a defect in the condition of the works.

County Court—Appeal—Right of appellant to raise point of law not taken by him in county court.

On an appeal against the decision of a case in the county court it is not open to the appellant to rely on any matter which was not raised in the county court at the trial.

Appeal by the plaintiff in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ.), reversing a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (HUDDLESTON, B., and WILLS, J.), affirming a judgment of the learned judge of Halifax County Court. B

The action was brought in that court by the appellant, a navvy, to recover damages against the respondents, who were railway contractors, for injuries sustained by him while in their employment. The appellant had been engaged on the respondents' works for some months prior to the day on which he received his injuries. The duty assigned to him was to work a hammer and drill with two other servants of the respondents, he working the drill, while they worked the hammer. On the day of the accident he was sent with two others to drill a hole. While they were thus employed, stones were being lifted from a cutting, which was seventeen feet or eighteen feet deep. When the stones were clear of the bank, the arm of the crane was jibbed in the one or other direction, according to the position of the waggons into which the stone was to be loaded. If it was jibbed in one direction, it passed over the place where the appellant was working. While he was working the drill, a stone in the course of being lifted fell upon him and caused serious injuries. In the county court the learned judge left questions to the jury, which were answered by them as follows: Q. Was the machinery for lifting stone from the cutting, taken as a whole, reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was applied?—A. No. Q. Was the omission to supply special means of warning when the stones were being jibbed a defect in the ways, work, machinery, and plant?—A. Yes. Q. If so, were the employers (or some person engaged by them to look after the condition of the works, etc.) guilty of negligence in not remedying that defect?—A. Yes. Q. Was the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence?—A. No. Q. Did the plaintiff voluntarily undertake a risky employment with a knowledge of its risks?—A. No. Application was made on behalf of the defendants to have judgment entered for them, notwithstanding the findings of the jury, on the ground that the case ought not to have been allowed to go to them, the plaintiff having admitted in evidence that he knew of the risk and voluntarily incurred it. The learned judge, however, directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for £100, the amount of damages assessed by the jury. Notice of motion to set aside the judgment, and to have judgment entered for the defendants, was afterwards given in the Queen's Bench Division. The grounds stated in that notice were as follows: C

"That the case ought not to have been allowed by the judge to go to the jury, the plaintiff having admitted that he knew of the risk which caused his injury, and voluntarily incurred it; that on the plaintiff's own admissions, made on the trial of the action, a nonsuit ought to have been entered by the judge; that the entry of the said judgment for the plaintiff was bad in law, and that the judge ought not to have entered judgment for the plaintiff." D

The learned judges before whom the appeal came, thinking that there was a conflict between the decisions of the Court of Appeal in Yarmouth v. France (2) and Thomas v. Quartermaine (3), which they were unable to reconcile, and it was desirable that the Court of Appeal should explain, dismissed the appeal in the present case, at the same time granting leave to proceed to the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal reversed the judgment of the court below mainly on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants, although the Lord Chief Justice expressed an opinion that the judgment of the county court judge ought to be set aside on another ground also—namely, that the E

A plaintiff had been engaged to perform a dangerous operation, and took the risk of the operation he was so called upon to perform. The plaintiff appealed.

Yarborough Anderson and Byrne for the appellant.

B July 21, 1891. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—This was an action originally tried in the county court, and it is very important to bear in mind that only a limited appeal is allowed by law in actions so tried. There is no power to review the decision of fact arrived at in the county court by any other tribunal than the county court itself [but see now County Courts Act, 1959, s. 109: 39 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 186]. A matter of law can be made the subject of appeal, but then only when the point has been raised at the trial before the learned judge. That question was decided in Rhodes v. Liverpool Commercial Investment Co. (4). In Seymour v. Coulson (5) the principle was affirmed that the point of law must be taken; and finally, in Clarkson v. Musgrave (1), where all the cases were reviewed, it was established (and I think has been accepted ever since) that the raising of the point of law at the trial is a condition precedent to any appeal from the decision of the county court. I think there are good reasons for so limiting an appeal, and, in truth, even where written pleadings render such precautions as the statute has enforced in the county court less necessary, the same precaution has been constantly enforced where applications for a new trial have been made in the superior courts. It is obvious that it would be unjust to one of the parties if the other could lie by, and afterwards, having failed on the contention that he in fact set up, be permitted to rely on some other point not suggested at the trial, which, if it had been suggested, might have been answered by evidence: see MacDougall v. Knight (6).

F The first question, therefore, to consider here is: What question was in fact raised before the county court judge in this case?, and, consequently, what question is open to your Lordships to consider on this appeal? The action was an action in which the plaintiff sued his employers for injuries sustained while in the course of working in their employment. He was employed in working at a drill while two fellow workmen were engaged in striking with a hammer at the drill, which he was employed to hold in the proper position. The nature of the employment G was one which involved his attention being fixed upon the drill, that it might be held in a proper position when receiving alternate strokes from the hammers wielded by his fellow workmen. The place where he was employed was in a cutting, and in his immediate proximity another set of workmen were engaged in working in the cutting, and taking stones out of it. For the purpose of this operation a steam crane was used, and occasionally, though not invariably, the H stones lifted by the crane were swung over the place where the plaintiff was employed. On the occasion which gave rise to the action a stone was swung over the plaintiff, and from some cause not explained, and not attempted to be explained, the stone slipped from the crane, fell upon the plaintiff, and did him serious injury.

I The first point attempted to be argued at your Lordships' Bar was that there was no evidence to go to the jury of any negligence. It is manifest upon the notes of the learned county court judge that no such point was taken at the trial, and it is, therefore, perfectly intelligible why no evidence is referred to with respect both to the crane, the manner of slinging the stone, or the mode in which the stone was fastened. Each of these things would have been material to consider if any such question had in fact been raised. I will not myself suggest, or even conjecture, what was the cause of the stone falling, or what precautions ought properly to have been taken against such a contingency. What is, or is not, negligence under such circumstances may depend upon a variety of considerations. If, for instance, the only result of not properly fastening a stone may be that it will fall back again, and so necessitate a repeating of the operation, there may be no negligence in not taking great care in so fastening the stone as to render such an accident improbable, if not impossible. It may be simply a question of whether the extra pains taken in fastening the stone may not be an unnecessary waste of time and care, and those engaged in the operation may well be justified in risking the possibility of the stone falling. But if the stone is to be lifted under such circumstances as, when lifted, to be swung over a workman beneath it, totally different considerations arise. And, I think, the unexplained, and unaccounted for fact, that the stone was being lifted over a workman, and that it fell, and did him damage, would be evidence for a jury to consider of negligence in the person responsible for the operation. But whether that was so or not, the question does not here arise.

The objection raised, and the only objection raised, to the plaintiff's right to recover was that he had voluntarily undertaken the risk. That is the question, and the only question, which any of the courts, except the county court itself, had jurisdiction to deal with. The facts upon which that question depends are given by the plaintiff himself in his evidence. Speaking of the operation of slinging the stones over the heads of the workmen, he said himself that it was not safe, and that whenever he had sufficient warning, or saw it, he got out of the way. The ganger told the workmen employed to get out of the way of the stones which were being slung. The plaintiff said he had been long enough at the work to know that it was dangerous, and another fellow-workman in his hearing complained that it was a dangerous practice. Giving full effect to these admissions, upon which the whole case for the defendants depends, it appears to me that the utmost that they prove is that in the course of the work it did occasionally happen that stones were slung in this fashion over workmen's heads, that the plaintiff knew this, and believed it to be dangerous, and whenever he could he got out of the way. The question of law that seems to be in debate is whether upon these facts, and on an occasion when the very form of his employment prevented him looking out for himself, he consented to undergo this particular risk, and so disentitled himself to recover when a stone was negligently slung over his head, or negligently permitted to fall on him and do him injury.

I am of opinion that the application of the maxim volenti non fit injuria is not warranted by these facts. I do not think the plaintiff did consent at all. His attention was fixed upon a drill, and while, therefore, he was unable to take precautions himself, a stone was negligently slung over his head without due precautions against its being permitted to fall. I emphasise the word "negligently" here, because, with all respect, some of the judgments below appear to me to alternate between the question whether the plaintiff consented to the risk, and the question whether there was any evidence of negligence to go to the jury, without definitely relying on either proposition. I say that here evidence of negligence must by the form of procedure below be admitted to have been given, and the sole question to be dealt with is that with which I am now dealing. For my own part, I think that a person who relies on the maxim must show a consent to the particular thing done. Of course, I do not mean to deny that a consent to the particular thing may be inferred from the course of conduct as well as proved by express consent; but if I were to apply my proposition to the particular facts of this case, I do not believe that the plaintiff ever did or would have consented to the particular act done under the particular circumstances. He would have said: "I cannot look out for myself at present. You are employing me in a form of employment in which I have not the ordinary means of looking out for myself. I must attend to my drill. If you will not give me warning when the stone is going to be slung, at all events let me look out for myself, and do not place me under a crane which is lifting heavy stones over my head when you keep my attention fixed upon an operation which prevents me looking out for myself."

It appears to me that the proposition upon which the defendants must rely must be a far wider one than is involved in the maxim volenti non fit injuria. I think

A they must go to the extent of saying that, wherever a person knows that there is a risk of injury to himself, he debars himself from any right of complaint if an injury should happen to him in doing anything which involves that risk. For this purpose, and in order to test this proposition, we have nothing to do with the relation of employer and employed. The maxim in its application in the law is not so limited, but where it applies it applies equally to a stranger as to anyone else, and

B if applicable to the extent that is now insisted on, no person ever ought to have been awarded damages for being run over in London streets. For no one (at all events, some years ago, before the admirable police regulations of later years) could have crossed London streets without knowing that there was a risk of being run over. It is, of course, impossible to maintain a proposition so wide as is involved in the example I have just given, and in both Thomas v. Quartermaine (3)

C and in Yarmouth v. France (2) it has been taken for granted that mere knowledge of the risk does not necessarily involve consent to the risk. BOWEN, L.J., carefully points out in the earlier case (Thomas v. Quartermaine (3)) that the maxim is not scienti non fit injuria, but volenti non fit injuria. And LINDLEY, L.J. (in Yarmouth v. France (2)), in quoting BOWEN, L.J.'s distinction with approval, adds (19 Q.B.D. at p. 660) :

D "The question in each case must be, not simply whether the plaintiff knew of the risk, but whether the circumstances are such as necessarily to lead to the conclusion that the whole risk was voluntarily incurred by the plaintiff."

Again, LINDLEY, L.J., says :

E "If in any case it can be shown, as a fact, that a workman agreed to incur a particular danger, or voluntarily exposed himself to it, and was thereby injured, he cannot hold his master liable. But in the cases mentioned in the [Employer's Liability Act, 1880] a workman who never, in fact, engaged to incur a particular danger, but who finds himself exposed to it, and complains of it, cannot, in my opinion, be held as a matter of law to have impliedly agreed to incur that danger, or to have voluntarily incurred it, because he does not

F refuse to face it."

Again, LINDLEY, L.J., says (ibid. at p. 661) :

"If nothing more is proved than that the workman saw danger, reported it, but, on being told to go on, went on as before in order to avoid dismissal, a jury may, in my opinion, properly find that he had not agreed to take the risk and had not acted voluntarily in the sense of having taken the risk upon G himself."

I am of opinion myself that in order to defeat, by the application of the maxim relied on, the right of a plaintiff who would otherwise be entitled to recover, the jury ought to be able to affirm that he consented to the particular thing being done which would involve the risk, and consented to take the risk upon himself. It is

H manifest that if the proposition which I have just enunciated be applied to this case, the maxim could here have no application. So far from consenting, the plaintiff did not even know of the particular operation that was being performed over his head until the injury happened to him, and consent, therefore, was out of the question. As I have intimated before, I do not deny that a particular consent may be inferred from a general course of conduct. Every sailor who mounts the

I rigging of a ship knows and appreciates the risk he is encountering. The act is his own, and he cannot be said not to consent to the thing which he himself is doing. And examples might be indefinitely multiplied where the essential cause of the risk is the act of the complaining plaintiff himself, and where, therefore, the application of the maxim volenti non fit injuria is completely justified. I have hitherto treated the question apart from the specific findings by the jury. But I am not disposed to think that those findings were not justified upon the evidence presented. They found that the machinery for lifting the stone from the cutting was not reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was applied, taken as a whole.

I think the jury meant, and if they did so mean, I am of opinion that they were right, that looking to the risk incurred by the men working below, and to the possibility of the crane when worked (as, in fact, it was worked) letting stones fall, the machinery was not reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was applied, that is to say, not reasonably fit for securing that stones should not fall from it when slung over men's heads. And further, that if with such machinery the stones were being slung over men's heads, special warning ought to have been supplied to the men imperilled by such an operation, and that the employers were guilty of negligence in not remedying such a mode of working such machinery under such conditions of work. A

I think the cases cited at your Lordships' Bar of Sword v. Cameron (7) and Bartonshill Coal Co. v. McGuire (8) established conclusively the point for which they were cited—that a negligent system or a negligent mode of using perfectly sound machinery may make the employer liable quite apart from any of the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act. In Sword v. Cameron (7) it could hardly be doubted that the quarryman who was injured by the explosion of the blast in the quarry was perfectly aware of the risk, but, nevertheless, he was held entitled to recover notwithstanding that knowledge. It seems to me that in the present case the right of the plaintiff to recover is far more clear than in Sword v. Cameron (7). The interval given to the quarryman to seek shelter was the usual and ordinary one. But suppose in that case the employer had employed the quarryman to do something which by the very form of the employment prevented his hearing the signal which gave him warning to retreat? In this case, as I have pointed out, there was no warning and no signal, but the employer or his representative employed the plaintiff under such circumstances as disabled him from using his eyes for protecting himself against the risk. It seems to me, therefore, that this is a case in which the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and I therefore move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed, and the judgment of the county court judge restored. B

LORD BRAMWELL.—If this case came before me in the first instance, without any entanglement of statement of claim, finding of a jury, question of objections taken, and former decisions, I should hold it to be the plainest possible, and that the plaintiff had no claim in law or morality. I say this, not from any prejudice against the Employers' Liability Act. I am not certain it would not be a good thing to give a person injured as the plaintiff was a right to compensation, perhaps from the State, even where there was no blame in the master; even where there was blame in the servant. Men would not wilfully injure themselves, and then compensation would be a part of the cost of the work. But we have to deal with the law as it is. What are the facts of this case? The plaintiff was employed by the defendants. The defendants were engaged in making a cutting for a railway, and, of course, had to remove what they excavated, and were doing so by putting the stones in a crate or in a sling, and raising them by a crane to the bank. The crane was turned so that the stones and sling passed over parts of the cutting, and, therefore, over persons who might be standing or working on those parts. A stone so slung, and so being lifted, fell, or parts of it fell, on the plaintiff, and most grievously hurt him. The plaintiff well knew of the possibility of such an accident. Those who were at work with him moved out of the way and escaped. The plaintiff did not; not knowing, as he says, of that particular movement of the crane. C

Now are the defendants to blame? There is no evidence that the crane was not the ordinary crane used for such purposes. No one says it was not. There is no evidence that lifting the stones as they were lifted, that is, by slinging them and jibbing the crane, was not the ordinary and reasonable way of working. No one says it was not. There is no evidence that the particular stone was improperly slung. No one says it was. I have no objection to res ipsa loquitur. I believe I was one of the first, if not the first, to use it in some cases about fifteen years ago; but it does not apply here. At least I cannot use it. I know that bales and barrels D

A do not move and fall of their own accord. I do not know that stones slung carefully will not come apart and fall. My notion is that they will. I think I have often lifted up a piece of coal and found that the part I had hold of remained in the tongs and the rest broke away. I should think there might be some cleavage, I think it is called, which would prevent the parts holding together. This may be ignorance on my part. But if it is, it should have been removed by evidence, and

B there is none. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and LINDLEY, L.J., are in the same state of ignorance, if it is one. Further, this is a claim which can only be maintained by virtue of the Employers' Liability Act. If there was negligence or unskilfulness in the slinging of the stone or working of the crane, it was not by anyone in authority within that Act. Lastly, the plaintiff knew of the danger, not of this particular stone, but generally that such stones might fall; yet he remained while

C it was passing over his head, not knowing, as he says, of this particular stone, but knowing that that kind of work was going on, and not looking out. His fellow workmen looked out, did know, and got out of the way. There was no one to warn the plaintiff. No one says that it was the practice that there should be, and the plaintiff knew there was no one.

Let us see what is the case that comes before us. The particulars of claim

D say that

"a stone or stones slipped from the crane chain and struck the plaintiff, by reason of the negligence of the defendants, they having failed to afford means of warning the plaintiff of the danger of continuing his work during the said craning operation, or of preventing the said stone or stones striking against him."

E The meaning of this is not certain. I think it is a complaint of want of "means of warning," whereby the plaintiff could prevent the stone striking against him. But it may be that it means a negligence in the slinging. So be it. If it is, there is no evidence of it. Then there is a claim that the accident was caused by the negligence of the foreman, whom the plaintiff was bound to obey, and did obey.

F Of this there is no evidence. Now, as to the evidence. I think it to the credit of the plaintiff that it was truthful, as it seems to me, substantially. He describes the operation, and he says that one of his fellow workmen told the then ganger that it "was not safe to allow them to jib the stones over our heads"; that whenever he and his fellow workmen saw them they got out of the way. He says he had been long enough at the work to know it was dangerous; that he heard another fellow

G workman say to the ganger that it was dangerous; that he, the plaintiff, thought so, and told the crane worker so; that if they had stood looking at the craning they would have been sent to the office, that is, discharged. One of the plaintiff's witnesses, West, says it was dangerous, and he so told the ganger; that he got out of the way when the stones were being jibbed; that he knew they had to look out for themselves, for there was no one to warn them. The ganger, called for the

H defendants, says he told them to get out of the way; evidently meaning step aside, not leave their work.

"1. Was the machinery for lifting the stone, taken as a whole, reasonably fit for the purpose to which it was applied?"

I I am sorry to say that the jury answered "No."

"2. Was the omission to supply means of warning a defect in the ways, works, machinery, and plant?"

The jury say "Yes." So that a man standing on the edge, as West says, would be part of the "plant."

"3. If so, the jury say the defendants were guilty of negligence in not remedying that defect."

Well "if so," it is true that they were negligent or wilful, if they knew of it, as I suppose they did. A

"4. Was the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence?"

The jury say "No." I incline to think so. It was not negligence on his part; he did it wilfully. Except, indeed, that he was negligent in not doing what his mates did, i.e., step on one side when the stone was coming, and not looking out for it. B

"5. Did the plaintiff voluntarily undertake a risky employment with knowledge of its risks?"

The jury say "No." I wonder what they meant. Indeed, the question is wonderful. The answer, to make it favourable to the plaintiff, is necessarily negative, a negative pregnant of one affirmative and another negative—twins. It might mean that the plaintiff did not voluntarily undertake the employment, or that it was not risky, or that he had not a knowledge of its risks. In any and every sense it is untrue, and, I think, not to the credit of the jury who gave it. C

On this the defendants' advocate applied for judgment, the plaintiff having admitted that he knew of the risk, and voluntarily incurred it. Judgment, however, was given for the plaintiff. There was an appeal to the Queen's Bench Division, that the case ought not to have been allowed to go to the jury, because the plaintiff, having admitted he knew of the risk which caused the injury, voluntarily incurred it. The court considered themselves bound or fettered by some decision of the Court of Appeal, which that court had better solve, and dismissed the appeal, but very clearly indicated that their own opinion was the other way. WILLS, J., said: D

"If I were an authority, I should have said that the evidence is all one way on the point of the man voluntarily accepting the risk, and I cannot draw the distinction between the man accepting the risk in the first instance, and his continuing in the employment under circumstances which brought the risk to his mind." E

"This case is clearly within the decisions that have been pronounced in the court below, and in this court, in which it has been held, and I think most properly held, that a person who is engaged to perform a dangerous operation takes the risk of the operation of the work that he is called on to perform. As to that, there never was any doubt before the Employers' Liability Act, nor since." G

I think that is a very neat and forcible way of putting it. He gives judgment for the defendants also on another ground, viz., that there was no evidence of negligence in the defendants causing the accident. There certainly was none; but it is said this was not open to the defendants. LINDLEY, L.J., gives judgment the same way; his judgment is of extra importance, because it shows that Yarmouth v. France (2), relied on for the plaintiff, is not, in the opinion of LINDLEY, L.J., who was party to it, against the defendants. His Lordship says: H

"If people will enter into dangerous employment, they do so without making other people liable for injuries they sustain." I

I cite also his Lordship's opinion to justify my own, that

"the jury were led away by sympathy, for they found matters that were not in the least warranted by the evidence. I think there was no evidence of negligence at all."

LOPES, L.J., says the same.

The case is now before your Lordships, and there cannot be a doubt how it ought to be decided, unless by some miscarriage of jury or judge, or counsel, the

A defendants are to be made liable, where they are absolutely free from legal blame. In the course of the argument, I said that the maxim volenti non fit injuria did not apply to a case of negligence; that a person never was volens that he should be injured by negligence, at least, unless he specially agreed to it; I think so still. The maxim applies where, knowing the danger or risk, the man is volens to undertake the work. And I think the maxim does apply here, for the complaint in the statement of claim (the only thing proved) was that there was no one to give notice when the stone was passing over where the plaintiff was at work. If this was wrong the plaintiff knew of it, and voluntarily undertook the risk. The case is different from a street accident where a man is injured by the act of one between whom and him there is no relation. It is not dangerous apart from negligent driving. There is indeed a likeness. I admit that personal negligence in the master would make him liable. So also the use of dangerous plant not known to the servant. If this is a maxim is it any the worse? What are maxims but the expression of that which good sense has made a rule? It is a rule of good sense that if a man voluntarily undertakes a risk for a reward which is adequate to induce him, he shall not, if he suffers from the risk, have a compensation for which he did not stipulate. He can if he chooses say: "I will undertake the risk for so much, and if hurt you must give me so much more, or an equivalent for the hurt." But drop the maxim. Treat it as a question of bargain. The plaintiff here thought the pay worth the risk, and did not bargain for a compensation if hurt; in effect he undertook the work with its risks for his wages and no more. He says so. Suppose he had said "If I am to run this risk you must give me 6s. a day and not 5s.," and the master agreed, would he in reason have a claim if he got hurt? Clearly not. What difference is there if the master says: "No, I will only give the 5s.?" None. I am ashamed to argue it. I refer to the judgments of BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., in Thomas v. Quartermaine (3). It is not necessary to discuss Yarmouth v. France (2) for LINDLEY, L.J., who was party to that judgment, is also a party to that now appealed from, and thinks that whatever that decided it decided nothing inconsistent with the judgment now under consideration. I respectfully express my dissent from that judgment in Yarmouth v. France (2). and my concurrence with the observations of WILLS, J., on it.

The fourth question ought not to have been left to the jury. The plaintiff could not make a case without showing his agreement with the defendants to do work involving this risk. If he had said he did not know of this practice of slinging the stones and passing them over the heads of other workmen it would have been false, but a question for the jury. If left to the jury, technically the judge ought to have directed them, on the confession of the plaintiff, to find for the defendants; a verdict the other way would have been perverse. I have always understood that when either party confesses to that which entitles the other side to a verdict, the judge may so direct it, as he ought to have done here. Would it not be absurd to say: "I ask you to say whether so and so is the case?" The plaintiff admits it is.

H There is a confusion in the case. "Volenti non fit injuria" say the defendants. The plaintiff answers: "But you were negligent." The defendants reply: "No, we were not." The plaintiff rejoins: "You did not take that objection at the trial." I do not agree; but, supposing it was so, what has that got to do with the question? The plaintiff advances this proposition, you cannot rely on volenti non fit injuria, because that does not apply to a case of negligence. A man may be volens to encounter the natural dangers of a business, but not those superadded by negligence. I agree. But the plaintiff's proposition involves that he must make out negligence to take the case out of the rule. Assume that the defendants at the trial only took the objection volenti non fit injuria, that meant: "You were willing to run the ordinary risks; if you say there was anything extraordinary, show it." There certainly was none for the reasons I have given.

Why are we to say that the danger was enhanced when there is positively no evidence of it? What was the danger the plaintiff was willing to run? This; having stones slung in a particular way jibbed over his head with the risk of their falling from bad slinging or other cause, and nobody to warn him when the jibbing A caused the stone to come over him. How did the defendants enhance this? Did they cause the stone to be slung dangerously? As to no warning, the plaintiff knew he would have none. The plaintiff must have known that, if not inevitable or probable, the accident was possible. It is argued that there was a breach of duty in the defendants. What duty? Did the defendants ever undertake with the plaintiff that they would conduct their works otherwise than as they did that day? B

There is no such thing as abstract duty. Is there any evidence that the works were not being conducted as they were when the plaintiff entered the defendants' service? It is not necessary to consider whether this action would lie if the work was more dangerous after the employ had been entered into, and the workmen knew it. It was, indeed, once held that if an obstruction was put before a cabman's stable he might run into it, and, if damaged, recover. I think the right C course for the workman would be to say: "I entered your employment with a certain amount of risk, or with no risk, and you undertook to employ me; you have made it dangerous; that is a breach of your engagement, and I sue you."
But it is immaterial in this case, for the work was unchanged in character, and was the same when he entered the service as when he was hurt. Besides, in these services every week there is a new engagement, and, therefore, his last week's work was under a contract made by the plaintiff with full knowledge of the risk. If we suppose the contract was from week to week till determined by notice, surely he is volens if he does not give the notice. It is said that to hold that the plaintiff is not to recover, is to hold that a master may carry on his work in a dangerous way and injure his servant. I do so hold if the servant is foolish enough to agree to it. This sounds very cruel. But do not people go to see dangerous sports? Acrobats daily incur fearful dangers; so do lion tamers, and the like. E Let us hold to the law. If we want to be charitable, gratify ourselves out of our own pockets.

As to the authorities, it is a little amusing that LINDLEY, L.J., should be cited to show that his very clear judgment in this case was wrong. As to the opinion of LORD CRANWORTH, I hold it in the highest respect, but it has no bearing on this case. He said the system was wrong. That system was indeed known to the workman, but not its danger. But there is another question. I think it clear that there was no evidence of wrong, negligent or wilful, in the defendants. It is called negligence, but there was no negligence; what was done was done wilfully and intentionally. I am surprised it should be said as against the defendants that there was no explanation or suggestion as to what was the cause of the disaster. G
There was not. But who was to give it? Not the defendants; the plaintiff was to make out his case. It may be that it is in the power of an employer conducting operations such as these to prevent such injuries as this. But who is to prove it?
I say, then, there was no evidence of wrong, negligence, or wilfulness in the defendants. It is said that this is not open to them; that the objection was not taken at the trial. I think it clearly was. The defendants applied for a nonsuit H at the end of the plaintiff's case. Why? Because there was no evidence for the jury. When it was said the thing was intrinsically dangerous, the defendants used the maxim volenti non fit injuria. If this question was not open to the defendants, why was not that objection taken in the Queen's Bench Division and Court of Appeal? A new trial might have been granted. This case is wholly different from Clarkson v. Musgrave (1), where the objection in the Appeal Court was of a wholly different character from that in the county court, and did not, as it were, arise out of it as here. Here the defendants say there is no evidence of wrong in us. Answer: Your very work is dangerous. Reply: But you knew it, and undertook it with full knowledge of the extent of the danger. Whether taken or not, it should be open to the defendants. Error is caput lupinum. Up to the last moment, if there was irremediable error, it may be objected to. That was here. On this ground, also, the defendants should succeed. Something ought to be done; a new trial granted, if necessary, to prevent the defendants being made I

A liable to pay damages which, in the opinion of many judges, there was no ground for claiming against them, and which never would have been claimed but in the hope of an unjust verdict from a jury. Fortified by the opinion of those judges, I should think this is a plain case for the defendants, but that I know your Lordships think otherwise. I am of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed.

B LORD WATSON. This action was brought in the county court of Yorkshire by the appellant, for recovery of damages from the respondent firm, who are railway contractors, in respect of personal injuries sustained by him in their service. The jury, under direction of the judge, returned six specific findings. Three affirmed facts implying fault on the part of the respondents, one negatived contributory negligence, and another assumption of risk by the appellant, while the sixth assessed damages at £100. Judgment was delayed in order to give either party C an opportunity of moving to have it entered in their favour. At the hearing the respondents confined their challenge of the verdict to the finding relating to risk. They moved for a nonsuit,

D "on the ground that the case ought not to have been allowed to go to the jury, the plaintiff, having admitted that he knew of the risk and voluntarily incurred it."

The county court judge refused the motion, and entered judgment for the plaintiff for £100. The respondents appealed to a Divisional Court consisting of HUDDLESTON, B., and WILLS, J., who, in consequence of doubts as to the effect of certain recent cases, without expressing any final opinion, took the course of dismissing the appeal, with leave to the respondents to carry the case to the Court of Appeal, in order to obtain an authoritative exposition of the law involved in the maxim volenti non fit injuria. The case then came before an Appeal Court, composed of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., with LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ., who recalled the decree obtained by the plaintiff in the county court, and directed judgment to be entered for the defendants in the action. In delivering judgment, LORD COLERIDGE F dealt with the point which had been raised in the county court, and expressed his opinion that the judge erred in refusing to hold that the plaintiff undertook to perform a dangerous operation, and took upon himself the risk attending that operation. His Lordship then proceeded to consider the findings with respect to fault, and came to the conclusion that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury. LINDLEY, L.J., rested his decision upon the second of these grounds, being of opinion that, according to the evidence, the plaintiff's injuries were the G result of "pure accident without any element of negligence in it." In expressing the same view, LOPES, L.J., remarked that the "vexed question with regard to the application of the principle of volenti non fit injuria, which arose in Thomas v. Quartermaine (3) and Yarmouth v. France (2) happily does not arise in this case."

H The provisions of s. 120, and following clauses of the County Courts Act, 1888, do not appear to have been brought to the notice of the learned judges of the Appeal Court. These enactments appear to me to exclude all right of appeal upon questions of law which were not raised and submitted at the trial to the county court judge [see 9 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 323]. The reasoning of FIELD and CAVE, JJ., in Clarkson v. Musgrave (1) although the decision turned upon the I terms of the County Courts Act, 1875, is in pari materia, and is, in my opinion, equally applicable to the statute of 1888. In this case, the contention that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury, was never mooted in the court of first instance. It was not raised in the notice of appeal to the Divisional Court, and it was neither included in the leave given by that court, nor referred to in the notice of motion before the Appeal Court. I am, in these circumstances, of opinion that the findings of the jury, bearing upon the question of the defendants' fault, must be taken as conclusive. The legislature has purposely taken away from them the right to raise, and from your Lordships the right to entertain, any question of law or fact affecting the validity of these findings. The only finding with which, in my opinion, this House has jurisdiction to deal, is embodied in the question put by the presiding judge:

“Did the plaintiff voluntarily undertake a risky employment with a knowledge of its risks?”

and the answer of the jury, which was, “No.” While I am of opinion that it is not within the jurisdiction of any court of review to set aside jury findings which were not impeached in the county court, it does appear to me to be legitimate and necessary in the present case to examine the findings which relate to negligence, in the light of the facts disclosed in evidence, not with the view of disturbing them, but for the purpose of appreciating their effect, and ascertaining the character of the risk which the plaintiff is alleged to have voluntarily undertaken. The facts in evidence do not raise any question of credibility. The real controversy, both in the county court and at your Lordships’ Bar, has been directed to the inferences which ought to be derived from them.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants from December, 1887, until April 13, 1888, in a rock cutting upon the Halifax High Level Railway. A line of rails upon which there was a travelling steam-crane and tackle ran along the edge of the cutting, and the quarried stone was lifted and deposited in trucks by means of the crane. The larger stones were secured by winding the chain round them, and hitching the end hook into one of its links; the smaller ones were packed in skips or crates. The plaintiff was engaged in loading the crane until the beginning of February, and after that date in assisting to drill holes for blasting. On April 13 he was turning a drill-rod which two of his fellow-workmen struck alternately with their hammers, when a large stone, which was in course of being raised by the crane, fell upon him, and inflicted the injuries complained of. His fellow-workmen saw the falling stone just in time to get out of its way; but the plaintiff, who was stooping at his work, had not time to make his escape. No evidence was led on either side, as to the character of the stone which fell, to the condition of the chain, or to the actual mode in which the stone was secured.

It appears to have been the practice during the whole period of the plaintiff’s employment to permit the crane load, whenever it was found convenient, to be swung directly above the workmen engaged in drilling. At its first start the load swung clear of them, but after it had attained some elevation, the arm of the crane was “jibbed” or deflected to one side or the other, as suited the convenience of those who were loading the trucks. Until the crane was jibbed, the plaintiff and others employed in drilling had no means of knowing whether its load would or would not pass over their heads. Neither of the parties disputed at the trial that the practice in question involved some degree of peril to the workmen employed in drilling. The plaintiff in the evidence stated that he had been long enough at that kind of work to know that the practice was dangerous. He also said:

“I had been at the same class of work in the same cutting. They were jibbing over our heads every day.”

“Sometimes we could see the stones being craned up, and when we saw them we got out of the way.”

Hanson, a witness for the defendants, who was their foreman in charge at the time of the accident, said that

“the men ought to have stopped work while the stone was being jibbed round, that would be the safe way.”

He admitted that no notice was given them; and he also said:

“If the men left their work every time the crane jibbed, it would take two and a half hours to do one hour’s work.”

There is evidence to the effect that the plaintiff and his fellow-workmen had previously complained to the foreman of the danger of slinging stones over their

A heads. There is no evidence to show that the practice was necessary to the conduct of the defendant's operations, and could not have been discontinued without interruption of their work.

The questions touching negligence which were left to the jury, and the answers returned by them were :

B “(1.) Was the machinery for lifting the stone from the cutting, taken as a whole, reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was applied? (Answer.) No. (2.) Was the omission to supply special means of warning when the stones were being jibbed, a defect in the ways, works, machinery and plant? (Answer.) Yes. (3.) If so, were the employers (or some person engaged by them to look after the condition of the works, etc.), guilty of negligence in not remedying that defect? (Answer.) Yes.”

C The framing of these questions may be open to criticism; but, on a fair construction of them, together with the answers given, what the jury meant to affirm seems to me to be tolerably plain. They were not, in my opinion, meant to represent three different phases of negligence, but to affirm three different propositions constituting one form of negligence, namely, the neglect of the defendants to take proper precautions for protecting their workmen from the possible consequences of a faulty system of working the crane.

D It is plain that the first question had no reference to any specific flaw in the crane or its tackle, because it expressly relates to the machinery “taken as a whole,” words which, as I understand them, were intended to cover the arrangement and use of the crane and its tackle considered in their relation to other departments of work carried on in the cutting. Accordingly, the first answer of the jury appears to me to affirm that the system of using the crane was not reasonably fit for its purpose, inasmuch as it exposed workmen in another department to unnecessary danger. The second affirms that the use of the crane without warning to the workmen over whose heads its load was jibbed, constituted a defect in the works; and the third, that the defendants, or their foremen, were negligent in respect of their failure to remedy that defect. I so construe the findings of the jury, because I feel bound, in the absence of any exception to the charge of the presiding judge, to assume that these questions, as explained by him to the jury, did not embrace any cause of action not arising on the pleadings, and that they did fairly raise the issues disclosed in the plaintiff's pleadings and evidence. It must be kept in view that, owing to the shape in which the case was submitted to them, the jury were invited to consider these three questions apart from the question of risk, or, in other words, upon the footing that the risk of a stone falling from the crane had not been undertaken by the plaintiff. The incidence of the risk was the subject-matter of a separate question. In that aspect of the findings with regard to negligence, I am not prepared to concur in the observations made upon them by the Court of Appeal. If the plaintiff did voluntarily undertake the risk from which he suffered, there could, as a matter of course, be no negligence imputable to the defendants. If, on the contrary, the principle of volenti non fit injuria were eliminated from the case, there would, in my opinion, be reasonable and sufficient warrant in the evidence for the verdict returned by the jury.

H It does not appear to me to admit of dispute that, at common law, a master who employs a servant in work of a dangerous character is bound to take all reasonable precautions for the workman's safety. The rule has been so often laid down in this House by LORD CRANWORTH and other noble and learned Lords, that it is needless to quote authorities in support of it. But, as I understand the law, it was also held by this House long before the passing of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 [repealed], that a master is no less responsible to his workmen for personal injuries occasioned by a defective system of using machinery than for injuries caused by a defect in the machinery itself. In Sword v. Cameron (7) the First Division of the Court of Session found a master liable in damages to a quarryman in his employment who was injured by the firing of a blast before he had time to reach a place of shelter, although it was proved that the shot was fired in accordance with the usual and inveterate practice of the quarry. That case was cited in Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid (9) in support of the proposition that the doctrine of collaborateur was unknown to the law of Scotland; but LORD CRANWORTH pointed out (3 Macq. at pp. 289, 290) that the decision did not turn upon the negligence of the fellow-workman who fired the shot, and expressly stated that it was justifiable, on the ground that

“the injury was evidently the result of a defective system not adequately protecting the workmen at the time of the explosions.”

LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C., expressed the same view in Bartonshill Coal Co. v. McGuire (8). The judgment of LORD WENSLEYDALE in Weems v. Mathieson (10) clearly shows that the noble and learned Lord was also of opinion that a master is responsible in point of law not only for a defect on his part in providing good and sufficient apparatus, but also for his failure to see that the apparatus is properly used.

The main, although not the sole, object of the Act of 1880 was to place masters who do not upon the same footing of responsibility with those who do personally superintend their works and workmen, by making them answerable for the negligence of those persons to whom they entrust the duty of superintendence, as if it were their own. In effecting that object the legislature has found it expedient in many instances to enact what were acknowledged principles of the common law. Section 1 (1) provides that the employer shall be liable in cases where a workman is injured

“by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer.”

I see no reason to doubt that an arrangement of machinery and tackle which, although reasonably safe for those engaged in working it, is nevertheless dangerous to workmen employed in another department of the business, constitutes a defect in the condition of the works within the meaning of the subsection. Sometimes (as in the present case), when the danger is not constantly present, but recurs at intervals, the defect may be cured by giving the workmen timely warning of its approach. The employer may in such cases protect himself, either by removing the source of danger, or by making provision for due notice being given. Should he adopt the latter course, he will still be exposed to liability if injury results from failure to give warning, through the negligence of himself or of his superintendent.

The only question which we are called upon to decide, and I am inclined to think the only substantial question in the case, is whether, upon the evidence, the jury were warranted in finding, as they did, that the plaintiff did not “voluntarily undertake a risky employment with a knowledge of its risks.” Whether the plaintiff appreciated the full extent of the peril to which he was exposed, or not, it is certain that he was aware of its existence, and apprehensive of its consequences to himself; so that the point to be determined practically resolves itself into the question whether he voluntarily undertook the risk. If upon that point there are considerations pro and contra requiring to be weighed and balanced, the verdict of the jury cannot be lightly set aside. The defendants' case is that the evidence is all one way—that the plaintiff's continuing in their employment after he had become aware and had complained of the danger, of itself affords proof absolute and conclusive of his having accepted the risk of a stone falling in the course of its transit from the quarry to the loading bank. The maxim volenti non fit injuria, originally borrowed from the civil law, has lost much of its literal significance. A free citizen of Rome who, in concert with another, permitted himself to be sold as a slave, in order that he might share in the price, suffered a serious injury; but he was, in the strictest sense of the term, volens. The same can hardly be said

A of a slater who is injured by a fall from the roof of a house; although he, too, may be volens in the sense of English law.

In its application to questions between the employer and the employed, the maxim, as now used, generally imports that the workman had either expressly or by implication agreed to take upon himself the risks attendant upon the particular work which he was engaged to perform, and from which he has suffered injury.

B The question which has most frequently to be considered is, not whether he voluntarily and rashly exposed himself to injury, but whether he agreed that, if injury should befall him, the risk was to be his and not his master's. When, as is commonly the case, the incidence of the risk is left to implication, the workman cannot reasonably be held to have undertaken it, unless he knew of its existence, and appreciated, or had the means of appreciating, its danger. But assuming that

C he did so, I am unable to accede to the suggestion that the mere fact of his continuing at his work, with such knowledge and appreciation, will in every case necessarily imply his acceptance. Whether it will have that effect or not depends, in my opinion, to a considerable extent upon the nature of the risk, and the workman's connection with it, as well as upon other considerations, which must vary according to the circumstances of each case.

D It is material to notice that the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, [repealed] under which the present action was brought, by s. 2 (3), provides that a workman shall have no right to compensation for injuries caused by reason of any defect or negligence which is specified in s. 1, in any case where

"he knew of the defect or negligence which caused his injury, and failed within a reasonable time to give, or cause to be given, information thereof to the employer or some person superior to himself in the service of the employer, unless he was aware that the employer or such superior already knew of the said defect or negligence."

I think the object and effect of the enactment is to relieve the employer of liability for injuries occasioned by defects which were neither known to him nor to his delegates down to the time when the injury was done. At common law his ignorance would not have barred the workman's claim, as he was bound to see that his machinery and works were free from defect, and so far the provision operates in favour of the employer; but, as was forcibly pointed out by LORD ESHER, M.R., in Thomas v. Quartermaine (3), in cases where the employer and his deputies were personally ignorant of the defect it is made a condition precedent

G of the workman's right to recover that he shall have given them information of it before he was injured. That does not lead me to the conclusion that the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act wholly exclude the application of the doctrine volenti non fit injuria to claims falling within the scope of the Act; but it does, in my opinion, show that the legislature did not intend that the statutory remedy given to the workman should be taken away simply by reason of his continuing in

H the same employment after he became aware of the defect from which he ultimately suffered.

There are many kinds of work in which danger is necessarily inherent, where precautions such as would ensure safety to the workman are either impossible or would only be attainable at an expense altogether incommensurate with the end to be accomplished. In all such cases the workman must rely upon his own nerve

I and skill, and, in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, the risk is held to be with him, and not with the employer. On the other hand, there are cases in which the work is not intrinsically dangerous, but is rendered dangerous by some defect which it was the duty of the master to remedy. In cases of that description the relations of the workman to the peril are so various that it is impossible to lay down any rule regarding the operation of the maxim which will apply to them all alike; and I shall refer to two instances only by way of illustration. The risk may arise from a defect in a machine which the servant has engaged to work, of such a nature that his personal danger and consequent injury must be produced by his own act. If he clearly foresaw the likelihood of such a result, and, notwithstanding, continued to work, I think that, according to the authorities, he ought to be regarded as volens. The case may be very different when there is no inherent peril in the work performed by the servant, and the risk to which he is exposed arises from a defect in machinery used in another department, over which he has no control.

The present case belongs to that category. There was no intrinsic danger in the operation of drilling in which the plaintiff was engaged; the peril from which he suffered was not evoked by his act, but was brought into contact with him by workmen employed in a different operation. I should be prepared to hold that, apart from the Act of 1880, the plaintiff's remedy was not necessarily taken away by the mere fact that, in the knowledge of the risk and after remonstrance, he continued to work. In the circumstances of this case, the question whether he had accepted the risk is one of fact: there is no arbitrary rule of law which decides it. The complaints made to the foreman by the plaintiff and his fellow-workmen, coupled with the fact of their continuing to work, might be fairly construed as an intimation to the defendants that they must either discontinue the vicious practice of slinging stones over the heads of their workmen, or take the consequences. It was a protest against the practice, which does not naturally or necessarily imply that they were willing to submit to it, or to accept the risk of it.

I am confirmed in that view by the decision in Sword v. Cameron (7), which came very near in its circumstances to the present case. There the dangerous practice consisted in firing a shot at so short an interval after notice to the workmen that they had not time to reach a place of safety; and the pursuer had continued to work until he was injured, in full knowledge of the practice and its attendant risks. The Court of Session held that the maxim volenti non fit injuria did not apply; and it appears to me that, in Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid (9), LORD CRANWORTH approved of the judgment. It is true that in the Bartonshill Cases (8), (9) there was no question directly raised in regard to the maxim; but the noble and learned Lord examined the facts of Sword v. Cameron (7) in detail, and expressed the opinion, not that the decision might be explained, but that it was justifiable in the circumstances of the case. This case, however, is under the statute of 1880, and, as already indicated, I am of opinion that the mere fact of the plaintiff having continued in the employment of the defendants cannot defeat his statutory claim. I, therefore, concur with the majority of your Lordships in thinking that the order of the Court of Appeal must be reversed, and the judgment of the county court judge restored.

LORD HERSCHELL stated the facts and the course of the proceedings and continued: The first argument addressed to your Lordships by the learned counsel for the appellant was that it was not competent for the respondents to raise the objection that there was no evidence of negligence, no such point having been made in the county court. In support of this proposition he cited Clarkson v. Musgrave (1), which is a distinct authority to that effect. The learned counsel for the respondents did not impeach the authority of that decision, or invite your Lordships to overrule it. I see no reason to think the decision was erroneous. It would, in my opinion, be very mischievous if an appeal from the decision of a county court could be sustained on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury, when that point had not been raised before the county court judge. In the present case it is perfectly clear that no such objection was ever taken. At the close of the evidence for the plaintiff, the only ground submitted for a nonsuit was, that the plaintiff had himself admitted that he knew of the risk, and voluntarily incurred it, and it was on this ground that the defendants applied to have judgment entered for them, notwithstanding the finding of the jury. Indeed, in the notice of motion in the Queen's Bench Division on appeal from the county court, the ground that there was no evidence of negligence is nowhere taken. I think that it was not

A competent for the Court of Appeal to inquire whether there was any evidence of negligence.

For the reasons I have given, I do not think it is necessary to determine whether there was such evidence in the present case, but I am far from being satisfied that there was not. No satisfactory explanation was given of the cause which led to the fall of the stone and the consequent injury to the plaintiff. It is said that while in some cases the fall of a substance, such as a bale of cotton which is being raised by a crane, would, if unexplained, be evidence of negligence, the fall of a stone from a crane, as in the present instance, is not so, because stone is apt to disintegrate, and thus to fall; but I am not prepared to admit that it is beyond the reasonable power of an employer conducting operations such as those in question to prevent the risk of injury to life or limb of those who are working at the locality over which the stones are being lifted. I should have thought it would have been possible to use such appliances as under ordinary circumstances to prevent the risk of the stones falling; but if it be not possible to do so, and the stones cannot pass over those engaged in other operations below without serious danger to them, it would certainly be within the employer's power to warn them when it is necessary to desist from work and get out of the way of the impending risk. It seems to me, then, that the employer in such a case is in this dilemma: either it was reasonably practicable for him to use appliances by which the accident would have been avoided, in which case he should have done so; or, if it was not, sufficient warning should have been given to those endangered to enable them to escape the danger. It is, of course, possible that the employer might have shown that neither of these courses was reasonably practicable. But that is immaterial. All that I am concerned with at the present moment is whether the accident which happened afforded evidence of negligence.

It was, of course, open to the respondents to contend that, after the admission of the plaintiff as to his knowledge of the dangerous character of the work, the case ought to have been withdrawn from the jury, and judgment entered for them, and this was the point strenuously argued at your Lordships' Bar on their behalf. It was said that the maxim volenti non fit injuria applied, and effectually precluded the plaintiff from recovering. The maxim is founded on good sense and justice. One who has invited or assented to an act being done towards him cannot, when he suffers from it, complain of it as a wrong. The maxim has no special application to the case of employer and employed, though its application may well be invoked in such a case. The principle embodied in the maxim has sometimes, in relation to cases of employer and employed, been stated thus. A person who is engaged to perform a dangerous operation takes upon himself the risks incident thereto. To the proposition thus stated there is no difficulty in giving an assent, provided that what is meant by engaging to perform a dangerous operation, and by the risks incident thereto, be properly defined. The neglect of such definition may lead to error.

Where a person undertakes to do work which is intrinsically dangerous, notwithstanding that reasonable care has been taken to render it as little dangerous as possible, he no doubt voluntarily subjects himself to the risks inevitably accompanying it, and cannot, if he suffers, be permitted to complain that a wrong has been done him, even though the cause from which he suffers might give to others a right of action. For example, one who has agreed to take part in an operation necessitating the production of fumes injurious to health, would have no cause of action in respect of bodily suffering or inconvenience resulting therefrom, though another person residing near to the seat of these operations might well maintain an action if he sustained such injuries from the same cause. But the argument for the respondents went far beyond this. The learned counsel contended that, even though there had been negligence on the part of the defendants, yet the risk created by it was known to the plaintiff, and inasmuch as he continued in the defendants' employment, doing their work under conditions the risk of which he appreciated, the maxim volenti non fit injuria applied, and he could not recover; that his proper course, if he wished to avoid the risk of his employer's negligence, was to refuse to perform the work under such conditions. Their argument necessarily went this length, for the fact on which it was grounded was simply that the plaintiff had admitted that he knew the work was dangerous. I am not quite sure that he was not referring in his answer to the character of the work generally rather than to the special danger arising from jibbing the stones overhead; but in a subsequent answer he stated that he had heard a fellow-workman say to the ganger that it was dangerous to jib stones and skips over their heads, and that he thought so too. A B

It is obvious that the degree in which the work was dangerous depended entirely on the conditions under which it was carried on, and the amount of care exercised. It would be practically unimportant, or very great, according to the character of the appliances used, the mode in which the stone was slung, and the presence or absence of warning at the critical time. In the present case it must be taken on the finding of the jury that the danger was at least enhanced and the catastrophe caused by the negligence of the defendants; and the question for your Lordships' consideration is whether under such circumstances the fact of the plaintiff having continued to perform the duties of his service precludes his recovery in respect of this breach of duty because the acts or defaults which constituted it were done volens. There may be cases in which a workman would be precluded from recovering, even though the risk which led to the disaster resulted from the employers' negligence. If, for example, the inevitable consequence of the employed discharging his duty would obviously be to occasion him personal injury, it may be that, if with this knowledge he continued to perform his work and thus sustained the foreseen injury, he could not maintain an action to recover damages in respect of it. Suppose, to take an illustration, that owing to a defect in the machinery at which he was employed the workman could not perform the required operation without the certain loss of a limb. It may be that if he, notwithstanding this, performed the operation, he could not recover damages in respect of such a loss; but that is not the sort of case with which we have to deal here. It was a mere question of risk which might never eventuate in disaster. The plaintiff evidently did not contemplate injury as inevitable, not even, I should judge, as probable. C D E F

Where, then, a risk to the employed, which may or may not result in injury, has been created or enhanced by the negligence of the employer, does the mere continuance in service, with knowledge of the risk, preclude the employed, if he suffer from such negligence, from recovering in respect of his employer's breach of duty? I cannot assent to the proposition that the maxim volenti non fit injuria applies to such a case, and that the employer can invoke its aid to protect him from liability for his wrong. It is quite clear that the contract between employer and employed involves on the part of the former the duty of taking reasonable care to provide proper appliances and to maintain them in a proper condition, and so to carry on his operations as not to subject those employed by him to unnecessary risk. Whatever the dangers of the employment which the employed undertakes, among them is certainly not to be numbered the risk of the employer's negligence, and the creation or enhancement of danger thereby engendered. If, then, the employer thus fails in his duty towards the employed, I do not think that because he does not straightway refuse to continue his service, it is true to say that he is willing that his employer should thus act towards him. I believe it would be contrary to fact to assert that he either invites or assents to the act or default which he complains of as a wrong, and I know of no principle of law which compels the conclusion that the maxim volenti non fit injuria becomes applicable. G H I

It was suggested, in the course of the argument, that the employed might, on account of special risk in his employment, receive higher wages, and that it would be unjust that in such a case he should seek to make the employer liable for the result of the accident. I think that this might be so. If the employed agreed, in consideration of special remuneration or otherwise, to work under conditions in

A which the care which the employer ought to bestow, by providing proper machinery or in any other way to secure the safety of the employed was wanting, and to take the risk of their absence, he would no doubt be held to his contract, and this whether such contract were made at the inception of the service or during its continuance. But no such case is in question here. There is no evidence that any such contract was entered into at the time when the plaintiff was first engaged, and the fact that he continued work, notwithstanding the employer's breach of duty, affords no evidence of such special contract as that suggested. It is to be observed that the jury found that the plaintiff did not voluntarily undertake a risky employment with knowledge of its risks; and the judgment of the county court, founded on the verdict of the jury, could only be disturbed if it were conclusively established upon the undisputed facts that the plaintiff did agree to undertake the risks arising from the alleged breach of duty. I must say, for my part, that in any case in which it was alleged that such a special contract as that suggested had been entered into, I should require to have it clearly shown that the employed had brought home to his mind the nature of the risk he was undertaking, and that the accident to him arose from a danger both foreseen and appreciated.

D I have so far dealt with the subject under consideration as matter of principle apart from authority, but it appears to me that the view which I have taken receives strong support from the approval with which LORD CRANWORTH refers to Sword v. Cameron (7) in his judgment in Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid (9). In Sword v. Cameron (7) it was the pursuer's duty to work near a crane, and other servants were employed to blast the rock. The practice was to give a signal to the men by the word "fire." It was then the duty of the men employed at the crane to hasten away. The interval allowed before firing varied from one minute to two. The pursuer was struck when he had got fifty or sixty yards off. An interval of about two minutes elapsed between the order to fire and the explosion, and it was stated to have frequently occurred that by the effects of the explosion, stones flew over the heads of the retreating workmen. LORD CRANWORTH said (3 Macq. at p. 290):

F "This case may be justified without resort to such a doctrine as that a master is responsible for injuries to a workman in his employ, occasioned by the negligence of a fellow workman engaged in a common work. The injury was evidently the result of a defective system not adequately protecting the workmen at the time of the explosions. It is to be inferred from the facts stated that the notices and signals given were those which had been sanctioned by the employer; and that the workmen had been directed to remain at work near the crane until the order to fire had been given, and then, that after an interval of a minute or two, the explosion would take place. The accident occurred, not from any neglect on the part of the man who fired the shot, but because the system was one which did not enable the workmen at the crane to protect themselves by getting into a place of security."

H This case appears to me to be analogous to the present, and the ground upon which LORD CRANWORTH bases the liability of the employer to be applicable to it. It will be noticed that in that case the defective system which created the risk, and from which the pursuer suffered, was known to him, and that he continued his work notwithstanding this knowledge; yet it never appears to have occurred, either to the Scottish court or to LORD CRANWORTH, that this absolved the employer from liability.

I In Yarmouth v. France (2) the plaintiff was subjected to a risk owing to a defect in the condition of what was held to be plant within the meaning of s. 1 of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. He complained of this to the person who had the general management of the defendant's business, but was told, nevertheless, to go on with his work. He did so, and sustained the injury for which he brought his action. The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff must be assumed to have assented to take upon himself the risk.

On the authority of Thomas v. Quartermaine (3), to which case I will refer immediately, the Court of Appeal ordered a new trial. LINDLEY, L.J., said (19 Q.B.D. at p. 661):

"The Act cannot, I think, be properly construed in such a way as to protect masters who knowingly provide defective plant for his workmen, and who seeks to throw the risk of using it on them by putting them in the unpleasant position of having to leave their situations, or submit to use what is known to be unfit for use. . . . If nothing more is proved than that the workman saw danger, reported it, but, on being told to go on, went on as before to avoid dismissal, a jury may, in my opinion, properly find that he had not agreed to take the risk, and had not acted voluntarily in the sense of taking the risk upon himself."

I think that the judgment in Yarmouth v. France (2) was perfectly right, but I should not lay the same stress as LINDLEY, L.J., did upon the fact that the workman had remonstrated against the risk to which he was exposed, and on being told to continue his work did so to avoid dismissal. For the reasons which I have given I think that where a servant has been subjected to risk owing to a breach of duty on the part of his employer, the mere fact that he continues his work, even though he knows of the risk and does not remonstrate, does not preclude his recovering in respect of the breach of duty, by reason of the doctrine volenti non fit injuria, which, in my opinion, has no application to such a case. It appears to me that s. 2 (3) of the Employers' Liability Act indicates that the legislature regarded this as the law.

The respondents' counsel naturally placed his main reliance upon Thomas v. Quartermaine (3). The plaintiff there was employed in a room in the defendant's brewery, where a boiling and a cooling vat were placed. A passage which was in parts only three feet wide ran between these two vats, the rim of the cooling vat rising sixteen inches above the passage. The plaintiff went along this passage in order to get from under the boiling vat a board which was used as a lid, and as this lid stuck, the plaintiff gave it an extra pull, when it came away suddenly, and the plaintiff falling back into the cooling vat was scalded. The county court judge held that there was evidence of defect in the condition of the works in there being no sufficient fence to the cooling vat. He found that the condition of the vat was known to both the plaintiff and the defendant, and that the plaintiff had not been guilty of contributory negligence, and he gave judgment for him. The case was carried to the Court of Appeal, where the learned judges, BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ. (Lord ESHER, M.R., dissenting), affirmed a decision of the Divisional Court directing judgment to be entered for the defendant. The judgments of the learned judges forming the majority in that case were chiefly occupied by a consideration of the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act.

It appears to have been contended in that case that the effect of the statute was to preclude the employer from relying on the maxim volenti non fit injuria in cases where, but for the statute, such a defence would have been open to him. But it is to be observed that in the case there under consideration the county court judge had found that the defendant was himself aware of the defective condition of his works, and, if he had not taken reasonable care so to carry on his business as not to subject those employed by him to undue risk, he would, according to the law laid down by this House in the Bartonskill Coal Co. v. Reid (9) be prima facie liable to an action. The learned judges, however, came to the conclusion that the defendant was entitled to judgment because the maxim volenti non fit injuria applied, the county court judge having found that the condition of the vat was known to the plaintiff as well as to the defendant. I find myself unable to concur in the view that this could properly be held under the circumstances as matter of law. The fact seems to have been lost sight of that the danger to the plaintiff did not arise from the circumstance that he had to pass from one part of the premises to the other, in proximity to the vats, even if this would have justified the con-

A conclusion arrived at. The accident arose from an operation being performed by him in the neighbourhood of the vats, namely, getting a board which served as a lid from under one of them. As far as appears, this was among the ordinary duties of his employment, and if it was assumed that there was a breach of duty on the part of the employer in not having the vats fenced, as it obviously was, since if there had been no breach of duty it would not have been necessary to inquire whether the maxim volenti non fit injuria afforded a defence, it seems to me that it must have been a question of fact, and not of law, whether the plaintiff undertook the employment with an appreciation of the risk which arose on the occasion in question from the particular nature of the work which he had to perform. If the effect of the judgment be that the mere fact that the plaintiff, after he knew the condition of the premises, continued to work, and did not quit his employment, afforded his employer an answer to the action, even though a breach of duty on his part was made out, I am unable, for the reasons I have given, to concur in the decision. I think that the judgment of the court below in the case now before your Lordships ought to be reversed, and judgment for the plaintiff restored.

LORD MORRIS.—The circumstances of this case have been so fully stated by your Lordships who have already spoken, that it is unnecessary for me to repeat them. I concur in the conclusion arrived at by the Court of Appeal that the findings of the jury as to negligence were not warranted by the evidence, and that there was no evidence of negligence conducing to the plaintiff's injury; but I do not consider that it, therefore, follows that judgment should be entered for the respondents. The action was not one in the superior courts, and it must be governed by the statutes regulating appeals from the county courts. No objection was made at the trial on the part of the respondents that there was no evidence upon which the jury could find there was negligence on their part; nay, more, in the notice of motion, by way of appeal, in the Queen's Bench Division no objection was taken that there was no evidence of negligence.

The question of law raised at the trial, both at the close of the plaintiff's case in asking for a nonsuit, and at the close of the entire case in asking for judgment, was, that, the plaintiff having admitted that he knew the risk and voluntarily incurred it, the defendants were entitled to succeed. The Court of Appeal decided the case upon a question of law not taken at the trial. I can find no reference in any of the judgments in the Court of Appeal as to their competency to entertain and decide upon a point not made at the trial, nor does Clarkson v. Musgrave (1) appear to have been cited. It is an express decision, and one in which I entirely concur, that it is a condition precedent to the right of appeal that the question of law upon which it is desired to appeal should have been raised before the county court judge at the trial. If the point, that there was no evidence of negligence, had been made by the defendants at the trial, I am of opinion they would be now entitled to judgment; but, in my opinion, that point is not now open, and the case must be dealt with, assuming the findings of the jury as to the negligence of the defendants. Notwithstanding these findings, the respondents have argued that they are entitled to judgment, inasmuch as the appellant admitted he knew of the risk, and voluntarily incurred it. His evidence on that point was: "I am a navvy, and am accustomed to this particular work. I am at it long enough to know it is dangerous." And again: "I told the crane driver that it was not safe to jib stones over our heads." On the hypothesis that the respondents were guilty of negligence conducing to the accident, which is the result of the findings of the jury unchallenged at the trial, the respondents still rely on the application of the maxim volenti non fit injuria, and the decision in Thomas v. Quartermaine (3) as precluding the plaintiff from recovering.

The facts of that case are few and simple. A passage ran between a cooling and a boiling vat in the defendant's brewery. The plaintiff went along the passage to pull a board from under the boiling vat, and in so doing he pulled too strongly, and the board coming out suddenly he fell back into the cooling vat and was injured.

The county court judge held that there was no sufficient fence to the cooling vat, and that the condition of the cooling vat was known to both plaintiff and defendant. This latter finding was a mere truism, for both plaintiff and defendant must have seen and known that the cooling vat was not fenced. I concur in the decision of the Court of Appeal, and in the judgments of BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., in that case. In the first place, the danger from the narrowness of the passage and the unfenced state of the cooling vat, if it was a danger, was patent to the plaintiff, a workman employed there. Neither he nor anyone else complained of danger. There was no evidence that the passage was dangerous in the ordinary use of it. The accident happened in an extraordinary use of the passage, viz., the fall of the plaintiff while pulling with undue force the board. He was not directed to get the board. He did it of himself. There was no evidence, in my opinion, of any negligence of the defendants, and even if there was, it was patent and well known to the plaintiff, who voluntarily and with the fullest knowledge of the full extent of the danger incurred it. The principle, as laid down by BOWEN, L.J. (18 Q.B.D. at p. 697), is clear and conclusive, viz.:

"Where the danger is visible and the risk appreciated, and where the injured person, knowing and appreciating both risk and danger, voluntarily encounters them, there is, in the absence of further acts of omission or commission, no evidence of negligence."

Apply that principle to the facts of the present case as found by the jury. The appellant did not know that the machinery was not reasonably fit for the purpose; a fellow workman in his presence had complained of the danger of jibbing stones to Riggs, who had acted as ganger, and the appellant had complained to the crane driver, who laughed at him. I have already said that I see no evidence to support the finding that the machinery was not reasonably fit for the purpose, nor of any negligence in its use; but the finding so stands. The appellant may have voluntarily entered on a risky business, but he did not voluntarily undertake it, plus the risk from defective machinery. There must be an assent to undertake the risk with the full appreciation of its extent. In my opinion, the findings of the jury, in answer to questions 2 and 3, of negligence by the respondents in not supplying means of warning when the stones were being jibbed, does not avail the appellant. He undertook a dangerous work of drilling holes, while over his head (unless he moved away) stones were being hauled by a crane. That work he entered upon knowing it was dangerous to that extent. He worked for months knowing there was no special warning to caution him, but running his chance of getting out of the way when the crane would otherwise pass over his head. He was, in my opinion, both sciens and volens as to all the danger except that arising from unfit machinery. Of that danger he was not aware. I more than doubt if it existed at all; but the right of appeal is a statutable one; the respondents have not brought themselves within the statute in not objecting at the trial to the want of any evidence to support the first finding; while it stands, the maxim volenti non fit injuria appears inapplicable. How can the appellant be held voluntarily to incur a danger from unfit machinery, the unfitness of which he was admittedly not aware of? Thomas v. Quartermaine (3), for the same reason, is no authority for the respondents' contention. In the result, I am of opinion that the appellant is entitled to succeed on the course the case has taken, and with the limited right of review accorded to the Divisional Court, to the Court of Appeal, or to your Lordships' house.

BANK OF ENGLAND v. VAGLIANO BROTHERS

Bank—Bill of exchange—Forged bill—Representation by customer that bill genuine—Payment by bank—Discovery of forgery—Liability of bank to refund amount paid.

Where by his conduct the customer of a bank, however innocently, misleads the banker into the belief that a bill of exchange which he has accepted and passes to the bank for payment to the payee named thereon is a genuine bill, and the bank, relying in good faith on that representation, pays the bill, the customer cannot, on discovering that the bill was a forgery, recover from the bank the amount so paid.

A clerk of the respondents forged bills of exchange purporting to be drawn by one V. to the order of P. as payee, and by fraud obtained the genuine acceptances of the respondents to these documents. He also forged the endorsement of P. as payee. The respondents advised their bankers that the forged bills (among others) were coming due for payment, believing them to be genuine, and on presentation the bank paid the amount of the bills. In an action by the respondents to recover the amount so paid,

Held (LORD BRAMWELL and LORD FIELD dissenting) on the facts as a whole the conduct of the respondents had led the bank to believe that the bills were genuine, and, therefore, the bank was not liable to the respondents for the sums paid upon the forged bills.

Roberts v. Tucker (4) (1851), 16 Q.B. 560, distinguished.

Bank—Bill of exchange—Payee "fictitious" person—Actual person's name forged as payee—Right of banker to pay bill to bearer over counter.

By s. 7 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882: "Where the payee [of a bill of exchange] is a fictitious or non-existing person the bill may be treated as payable to bearer."

Where an actual person's name is forged as payee in a bill of exchange, so that he has not and never was intended to have any right to the proceeds of the bill, the person so named is a "fictitious" person within the sub-section, and the banker to whom the bill is sent by a customer for payment is entitled to treat it as payable to a de facto bearer and to pay it over the counter. If it be sought to charge the acceptor on such a bill, knowledge by him that the payee is a fictitious or non-existing person is not necessary to bring the case within the section.

So held by LORD HALSBURY, L.C., the EARL OF SELBORNE, LORD WATSON, LORD HERSCHELL, LORD MACNAGHTEN and LORD MORRIS, LORD BRAMWELL and LORD FIELD dissenting.

Per LORD HERSCHELL: A bill within the subsection may be treated as payable to bearer by any person whose rights or liabilities depend on whether it be a bill payable to order or one payable to bearer.

Bank—Bill of exchange—Duty of banker—Inquiry into genuineness of endorsements—Bill regular on face and regularly advised for payment by customer.

Per the EARL OF SELBORNE: If it were the duty or practice of bankers, without special reasons for suspicion, to refuse or delay payment of foreign bills appearing on their face to be regular, and regularly advised for payment by their customers, until they could ascertain by inquiry the genuineness of every foreign endorsement, it must continually happen that the bills would not be paid at the proper time and place, and bona fide holders might treat them as dishonoured.

[And see per LORD MACNAGHTEN, infra.]

Bank—Duty of Banker—Payment of customer's acceptances—Special contract—Presumption of reference only to genuine bills.

Per LORD MACNAGHTEN: The relation of banker and customer does not of itself and apart from other circumstances impose on a banker the duty of paying his customer's acceptances [of bills of exchange]. Bankers may refuse to pay their customers' acceptances and such refusal is not inconsistent with the relation of banker and customer or a breach of the banker's duty to his customer. If a banker undertakes the duty of paying his customer's acceptances, the arrangement is the result of some special agreement, express or implied. Such an agreement, in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, must have reference solely to genuine bills of exchange. Bankers who undertake the duty of paying their customers' acceptances cannot do otherwise than pay off-hand, and, as a matter of course, bills presented for payment which are duly accepted and regular and complete on the face of them. It would be out of the question for a banker to defer payment until satisfied by inquiry and investigation that all the endorsements on the bill are genuine. That is hardly a practical suggestion. A banker so very careful to avoid risk would soon have no risk to avoid.

Statute—Construction—Codifying Act—Consideration of previous state of the law—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882—Not code of existing law—Alteration of existing law.

Per LORD HERSCHELL: In interpreting an Act which is intended to be a code of law the proper course, in the first instance, is to examine the language of the statute and to ask what is its natural meaning uninfluenced by any considerations derived from the previous state of the law, and not to start with inquiring how the law previously stood, and then, assuming that it was probably intended to leave it unaltered, to see if the words of the enactment will bear an interpretation in conformity with this view. . . . I am, of course, far from asserting that resort may never be had to the previous state of the law for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the provisions of the code. . . . The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, was certainly not intended to be merely a code of the existing law. It is not open to question that it was intended to alter, and did alter, it in certain respects. It is not to be presumed that any particular provision was intended to be a statement of the existing law rather than a substituted enactment.

Per LORD MACNAGHTEN: Section 7 (3) of the Act of 1882 appears to me to have effected a change in the law in the direction of the more complete negotiability of bills of exchange.

Appeal by the defendant in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (COTTON, LINDLEY, BOWEN, FRY and LOPES, L.JJ., LORD ESHER, M.R., dissenting), reported 23 Q.B.D. 243, affirming a decision of CHARLES, J., reported 22 Q.B.D. 103, in favour of the plaintiffs, the present respondents, in a case tried by him without a jury.

The plaintiffs in the action had for many years carried on a large business as merchants and foreign bankers. Their transactions with the defendant, their banker, had prior to November, 1887, when their account was closed, been for a long period of great magnitude. The plaintiffs employed a considerable number of clerks at their office in London, and among them was one Anthony Isidor Glyka. With another clerk named Copchili he managed the foreign correspondence of the firm, and during the whole period of his employment the plaintiffs had entire confidence in him and had no reason whatever to suspect his integrity. Between February and August, 1887, however, Glyka, who had been speculating on the Stock Exchange, had, in order to meet his engagements there, by a series of frauds, obtained the plaintiffs' acceptance to forty-three forged bills, of which he received payment from the defendants to the aggregate amount of £71,500.

The frauds were perpetrated in this way. The plaintiffs had in various parts of the world a large number of correspondents, who were in the habit of drawing bills on them from time to time, sometimes consigning goods against the bills, and sometimes making direct remittances in money. The bills were ordinarily, but not by any means invariably, drawn in sets of two, one being headed "solely for acceptance," and the second, intended for negotiation, bearing the endorsements of the various holders through whose hands it might have passed. The correspondents were in the habit of advising the plaintiffs by letter of their having drawn upon them, giving in each instance the particulars of the draft. These letters of advice, which were for the most part in the Greek language, were generally opened by Glyka or Copchili, and placed by one or other of them before Mr. Vagliano. When he had read them they were brought back to the clerks' office and, after having a summary in English endorsed on them by one or other of the correspondence clerks, were handed to a clerk whose duty it was to enter the particulars in a book called the "bills payable book," and if payable after sight in a book called the "sight bill book." Particulars were also entered in a book called the "bills due book." In due course the bills themselves would reach the hands of the London agents of the payees, by whom those headed "for acceptance only" would be brought to the plaintiffs' office for acceptance, and there dropped into a box at the door marked "for bills only." At 4 p.m. every day this box was cleared by the clerk who kept the "bills payable book." He would then compare the bills with the particulars in the "bills payable book," and if they were in order would stamp across them the word, "Accepted, payable at the Bank of England," and in writing add the number, date of acceptance, and date when due.

In this condition the practice was to take them to Mr. Vagliano's room for

A acceptance, and they were then accepted by him. On the average ten to fifteen bills a day would be thus dealt with. Having been signed, they were placed in a portfolio in a bracket, from which they were subsequently taken and given up to those who called for and described them. When the clerk placed a stamp across a bill he was in the habit of noting in the bill book the name of the agent who had left it, if, as often happened, that name was stamped on the bill; if not, he used
B to attach a slip to the bill directing the clerk who delivered it out to get the name, and from the slip so filled up would make his note. An accepted bill being thus taken away by the agent of the payee would be placed with the second of the set—if there was a second—and then would be presented with or without the second as the case might be, at the Bank of England for payment. In most cases the bills would be presented through a banker, but on rare occasions they were paid across
C the counter.

Meanwhile, the bank would, in the ordinary course of business, have been advised by the plaintiffs at the commencement of each month of the bills coming forward for payment, the notice containing in each case the date of the bill, its number, the drawer's name and residence, the date when due, and the amount. With regard to bills which might come forward and be payable during the currency
D of the month, but had not been included in the monthly list, a similar note of advice in similar terms was always sent. The bills after being paid at the bank were returned at intervals of about a week with a pass-book, which indicated by numbers—but not otherwise—the payments which had been made. The cashier of the firm then checked the bills with the pass-book and with the entries in his cash-book, in order that he might be satisfied that the bills entered by him as
E having become due, and having been paid on certain days, were, in fact, paid. He was not in the habit of examining the endorsements, his reference to the book being simply to note their numbers and amounts, and solely for the purpose of verification. After having been checked with the pass and cash-books in the manner described the bills were packed up in parcels, labelled and put away, the pass-book being balanced half-yearly.

F Glyka, who was thoroughly acquainted with the routine of the office, had under his management, as one of the foreign correspondence clerks, the correspondence with persons resident in Russia. Among them was a Mr. George Vucina, a merchant and banker in Odessa, who for upwards of twenty-nine years had had constant business relations with the plaintiffs' firm. Practically his credit was unlimited. His drafts on Vagliano in each year were very numerous and amounted
G to many thousands of pounds. The bills were sometimes drawn to Vagliano's order, but far more frequently to the order of a named payee. Glyka, from his position in the plaintiffs' office, had no difficulty in possessing himself of specimens of Vucina's genuine letters of advice and of his genuine bills. Having done so, he had paper prepared identical in texture and in general appearance with that on which Vucina's business letters were written, and he had also bills prepared
H identical in all respects with Vucina's genuine bills. To these he proceeded to forge Vucina's name as drawer, and in each case he wrote on the face of the bill the name of "C. Petridi & Co.," a firm who carried on business at Constantinople, and had business relations with Vucina, as payees. In each case he stamped upon the face of the bill the name of "F. Pasqua & Son" as indicating the name of the London firm who had left the bills for acceptance. All the forty-three forged bills
I except two were drawn at three days after sight, the other two being drawn at one and two months after date respectively. Glyka, having forged a letter of advice from Vucina with reference to one of the bills, would place it in the morning with the ordinary correspondence of the firm, and having prepared the forged draft, dropped it into the bill box for acceptance; Mr. Vagliano would accept it in the ordinary course, and it would be placed in the portfolio to be called for by the supposed Pasqua. From this portfolio Glyka would abstract it, and thus he would obtain a genuine acceptance to the forged draft. He then proceeded to forge the endorsement of "C. Petridi & Co." to one Maratis, of Constantinople. The bills were then presented at the bank, sometimes by Glyka himself and sometimes by another person on his behalf, and were cashed across the counter. Eventually the forgeries were discovered, and Glyka was tried and convicted and sentenced to ten years' penal servitude. The action was brought to recover the amount so paid upon the forged bills. A

Mar. 5, 1891. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—The simple question in this case is whether the plaintiffs' bankers have paid away the plaintiffs' money under such circumstances as enable the plaintiffs to refuse to acknowledge the payments as made on their behalf. Each of the parties is innocent of any wilful default. They are both free from any suspicion of bad faith; but the banker has paid away and placed to the debit of his customer a sum of £71,500, while the customer was not conscious of and certainly never intended to authorise the payment of that sum on his behalf. The authorities to pay, which were relied upon by the banker as justifying the payments, were written documents in the form of bills of exchange, and, though they were not really bills of exchange at all, it is important to bear in mind what a real bill of exchange would import to the mind of a person to whom it was sent for payment. C D

Apart from the particular machinery by which this transaction was effected, it will not be denied that a principal who has misled his agent into doing something on his behalf which the agent has honestly done would not be entitled to claim against the agent in respect of the act so done; and upon this branch of the case the question is whether the agent was misled into doing the act by the default of the principal: Ireland v. Livingston (1). I will treat the transaction, for the sake of clearness, as if it were a single payment. Could it be doubted that, if the two parties met, and by word of mouth the customers had said to their banker: "There is a bill coming due tomorrow of such and such an amount; it is drawn on me by a customer of mine, named Vucina, and will be presented for payment at your bank tomorrow," such a statement was calculated to put the banker off his guard, and be likely to induce him to act as he did act? Does it make any difference that the words were not spoken, but upon the face of the document reaching the banker's hands by the act of the customers, in which phrase I include the course of Vagliano's business, said this as plainly as if the words had been spoken? Vucina, in fact, had not drawn any such bill. There was no transaction between Vagliano and Vucina such as the instrument in question purported to effect, and yet this was the written statement which upon the face of the instrument Vagliano made to the bank. Further, by a separate and independent writing, Vagliano told the bank that such a bill of exchange for such an amount was becoming due, and would have to be paid out of his account. No such bill of exchange existed, although a false document corresponding in all particulars was accredited by Vagliano in writing his acceptance upon it. E F G H

In estimating the effect upon an agent's mind, it must, of course, be remembered that, though I have here for clearness spoken of it as a single transaction, it is a transaction repeated forty-three times and spread over a considerable period. The false documents when paid were duly debited to the customers and duly entered in their pass-book, and so far as the banker could know or conjecture were brought to their knowledge on every occasion upon which the payment was made and the bills returned. Further, on each occasion when these false documents were by what I have called the act of the customer permitted to reach the bank for payment, they were accompanied by a considerable number of other genuine bills of exchange, many of them drawn by Vucina, and regularly entered in the notice of I

A bills about to become due, together with the false documents in question. It seems to me impossible to dispute that this was, in fact, a misleading of the bankers. I pass by for the moment the question whose default it was, for the purpose of considering the proposition which has found favour with one of your Lordships, and I will not dispute it, that the carelessness of the customer or neglect of the customer to take precautions unconnected with the act itself, cannot be put forward

B by the banker as justifying his own default.

In order to make the cases of Bank of Ireland (Governor & Co.) v. Evans' Charities Trustees (2) and Staple of England (Mayor, etc., of Merchants of the) v. Bank of England (Governor of) (3) authorities in this case, it would be necessary to assume that the plaintiffs in those cases had by some voluntary act of their own given credit and the appearance of genuineness to the particular powers of attorney

C which were forged in those cases; and, if they had, I very much doubt whether the decision would have been what it was, but no such fact appeared; all that the parties whose negligence was relied on had done was to leave their seal carelessly in the custody of the person who abused the trust. These decisions, therefore, do not seem to me to touch this case.

But how can it be said in this case that the default is unconnected with the act?

D The very thing which the banker does is induced by the fault of the customer. Was not the customer bound to know the genuineness of Vucina's draft? Was not the customer bound to know whether there was any real transaction between himself and Vucina, effected by the instrument in question? Was not the customer bound to know the contents of his own pass-book? Was not the customer bound to know the state of his account with Vucina? It certainly is very strange

E that it should be suggested that without any responsibility on his part he should be entitled to accredit forty-three documents to his bankers as genuine bills when he had the means of knowledge I have indicated that no one of them was a bill of exchange at all or represented any transaction between Vucina and himself. The bankers paid upon these documents, and they paid a person who was not entitled to receive the payment. There was no person entitled to receive it. The fact that

F it reached their hands as representing a mercantile transaction in which somebody was to be paid was itself a misleading of them, and that it did reach their hands purporting to represent such a transaction arose from the mode in which Mr. Vagliano's business was conducted by those responsible for it. I have designedly avoided calling these documents bills of exchange. They were nothing of the sort. But if they got into the hands of an innocent owner for value without

G notice, Vagliano would undoubtedly have been responsible upon them, for he had given them a genuineness as against himself by accepting them.

When it is insisted that the bankers are responsible because they did not pay the person indicated as payee, one is induced to inquire whether Mr. Vagliano, or any other merchant, would have expected that any inquiry should be made as to the genuineness of Petridi's signature. Suppose they had been genuine signatures of

H Petridi's, and the bills had been dishonoured while the bankers were making inquiries, would not Mr. Vagliano have had grave ground for complaint against the bankers who had allowed his credit to be thus disturbed? I think each of the parties to the transaction must be taken to have known the ordinary course of mercantile affairs, and it is manifest that no banker could hesitate to pay such bills as came to him, so accredited as they were by Mr. Vagliano's acceptance,

I without throwing the whole mercantile world into confusion.

I am not intending to throw any doubt upon the propriety of the decision in Roberts v. Tucker (4), nor am I prepared to assent to the proposition that it is a harsh decision. A customer tells his banker to pay a particular person, the banker pays someone else, and it would seem to follow as a perfectly just result that the banker should be called upon to make good the amount he has so erroneously paid. But what relation has such a decision to a case when a thing which bears the form and semblance of a known commercial document like a bill of exchange gets by the act of the customer into the hands of the banker where there is no real drawer, no real transaction between himself and the supposed drawer, and where, as a matter of fact, there is no person who in the proper and ordinary sense of the word is a payee at all? It seems to me that, if all these circumstances, acting upon and inducing the bank to make the payments they did make, are acts which are the fault of the customer, it is the customer, and not the banker, who ought to bear the loss. I think, under these circumstances, the banker did what was usual and customary with bankers and what both customer and banker knew to be usual and customary with bankers as far as the payment without inquiry as to the genuineness of the endorsement by Petridi & Co. was concerned.

But I propose to deal separately with the alleged negligence of the banker, or, at all events, the unusual course pursued by the banker in cashing these bills across the counter and paying to the person presenting the document for payment without inquiry. I do not know what is the usual course among bankers, and I should doubt whether in such a matter it would be possible to affirm that any particular course was either usual or unusual in the sense that there is some particular course to be pursued when circumstances occur necessarily giving rise to suspicion. I can well imagine that, on a person presenting himself whose appearance and demeanour were calculated to raise a suspicion that he was not likely to be entrusted with a valuable document for which he was to receive payment in cash, it would be extremely probable that, whether the document were a cheque payable to bearer for a large amount or a bill, the counter clerk and banker alike would hesitate very much before making payment. However, I will assume that the course pursued in this case was somewhat unusual, and that this is proved by the bankers themselves, though the counter clerk gave a different reason why the clerks called the attention of their immediate superior to the circumstance, and he in turn called the attention of Mr. Vagliano's representative. In doing so, he appears to me to have relieved the banker from any accusation of having hastily or carelessly paid these bills. What could the bankers know of the particular transactions of Messrs. Vagliano? But Mr. Vagliano, when it was communicated to him or to his representative, would be surely the best person to judge whether there was anything calculated to give rise to suspicion in the facts to which I have referred.

It has been sought to minimise the effect of that communication to Mr. Vagliano's representative, first, by treating him as a clerk to whom such a communication ought not to have been made, and secondly, by suggesting that Mr. Ziffo possibly indicated that he was a person not fit to be trusted, since he took a very strange view of what was or was not calculated to cause suspicion and enforce inquiry as to these bills. But what had the banker to do with Mr. Ziffo's capacity for business? He was Mr. Vagliano's confidential clerk, duly accredited as such. After one or two of the bills had been presented and paid in the manner I have referred to, Mr. Disney thinks it right to call the attention of Mr. Ziffo to the fact, and Mr. Ziffo replies to the information that they are presented over the counter and invariably taken in bank-notes: "I suppose if they are properly endorsed you must pay them." Here is information given of the very fact relied on to the confidential representative of Mr. Vagliano, and it is suggested to be negligence in the bank, that after receiving the answer I refer to, they continued to pay these bills when properly advised by Mr. Vagliano himself. I must add here that I think that the witness truly explained his inadvertent use of the word "endorsed," and meant to say "advised."

It appears to me that whatever case might be suggested against the bank is completely answered by the bank having communicated these facts to a person occupying such a position in Mr. Vagliano's house, and that his answer was such as to allay any suspicion or uneasiness on the part of the bank. I have not stopped to examine minutely the contrast between Mr. Ziffo's evidence and the bank's official, Mr. Disney, because if one comes to examine it carefully there is no real contradiction. One witness is positive as to communications actually made, and

A the other only meets that positive assertion by alleging a want of memory of any such communication.

One other point has been made at your Lordships' Bar, but I think under circumstances which do not entitle it to consideration. It is said that the course of post ought to have been known to the banker, and that the date of the endorsements ought of itself to have raised suspicion. Possibly if there was evidence B sufficient to prove exactly what the facts are as to the course of post—and, notwithstanding the evidence of one witness, I am not satisfied that we have the facts accurately as to the course of post—a serious doubt might arise, but it is enough to say for the purposes of this case that the point appears neither to have been pressed nor argued at a time when, by proper evidence, the matter could have been left beyond doubt, and the circumstances of excuse for not observing the dates, if C such excuses existed, could have been properly determined. I can find no evidence that that point was really pressed. It is not noticed in any of the judgments, and though to my mind it is a singular argument coming from the mouth of Mr. Vagliano, whose suspicions one would have thought would have been roused by the dates on the documents afterwards appearing, it is enough for me to say that I decline to consider a topic which has been neither really argued nor properly D fortified by evidence as a material circumstance to consider in this case.

I should be content to rest my judgment here, and to express my opinion that for these reasons the judgment of the court below should be reversed, although I regret to say that on this branch of the case my view is at variance with that of all the learned judges who have hitherto treated this question. I have hesitated long before I was able to acquiesce in the view of LORD HERSCHEL and that of the E Master of the Rolls that the same conclusion could be arrived at by a consideration of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. One difficulty I have had in the determination of that question is in applying to the instruments with which I have been dealing an enactment which deals with bills of exchange. For reasons which I have already given, it seems to me difficult to treat them as bills of exchange at all; but as against the person now insisting on their possessing the quality of such F instruments, and remembering that it was his act by which they are put into circulation in that character, it does not seem unreasonable that, applying the doctrine of estoppel to him, one may consider whether as against him they may not possess qualities which, in their inception, they did not possess. Section 7 of the Act, upon two sub-sections of which this question turns, commences thus:

G “(1.) Where a bill is not payable to bearer, the payee must be named or otherwise indicated therein with reasonable certainty. (3.) Where the payee is a fictitious or non-existing person the bill may be treated as payable to bearer.”

In the first instance, before dealing with the application of these sub-sections to the facts in debate, I must say that I cannot acquiesce in the view which the H majority of the Court of Appeal appear to have entertained that they were at liberty to import into sub-s. (3) that it was a condition of its application that the acceptor should be aware that the payee was a fictitious or non-existing person. It seems to me that, construing the statute by adding to it words which are neither found therein nor for which authority could be found in the language of the statute itself, is to sin against one of the most familiar rules of construction, and I am wholly I unable to adopt the view that where a statute is expressly said to codify the law you are at liberty to go outside the code so created because before the existence of that code another law prevailed.

To return to the construction of the language of the two sub-sections, for I think both should be read together, it seems to me that what the legislature was enacting was in substance that where a bill was not payable to bearer the person to whom payment was intended to be made was to be named or otherwise indicated upon the face of the instrument with reasonable certainty, but where there was no real payee the bill might be treated as payable to bearer. The language which the legislature has employed to express this law has been subjected to very minute verbal criticism. If the substance of the matter is looked at, and it is remembered that what the legislature was dealing with was what was to appear upon the face of the instrument, and contemplated the case of there being no one to whom payment could properly be made, no person on the face of the instrument having any rights under the bill, and no person, therefore, capable of giving a discharge to the acceptor for having paid at the demand of the drawer, it would seem that the reason of the thing would apply equally to a real person whose name was forged as to a person who had no existence. In truth, if strictly construed, the words "fictitious person" are a contradiction. One may pretend there is a person when there is not. One may assume a character which does not belong to one; but to satisfy the word "fictitious" as applicable to a person is assuming in one part of the proposition what is denied in the other. Some of the characters in SIR WALTER SCOTT'S novels may be fictitious in the sense that no such persons so named ever lived; but if real names are taken and events and conduct and character attributed by the writer to those real names, are the characters less "fictitious" because persons of those names identified with a totally different history and different qualities did in point of fact exist at one time?

One singular result of treating the section in the way that the Court of Appeal have adopted would be that one must dive into the mind of the hypothetical forger to determine whether the character be fictitious or not; and this may be done, though it is not necessary to find the forger's intention from the language or anything that appears on the face of the instrument itself, but you may judge from previous commercial transactions of the parties who was likely to be meant as giving plausibility to the forgery. But if it can be alleged, as it can be here, that the forger selected a name which would give plausibility to his forgery, and be likely to deceive those into whose hands his forged instrument should come, that is not the name of a fictitious person, although that person had no power to deal with the bill, and was not in any respect the real payee, any more than if the name had been selected of a person who had never been heard of or existed before, whereas, if it is pure imagination, then it is the name of a fictitious person.

I have come to the conclusion that, however expressed, the real meaning of the sub-section is to imply the unreality of any person who is named upon the face of the instrument as the payee of the bill. The statute itself uses the phrase "payee." That cannot mean in truth the payee, because by the hypothesis there is no payee, and dealing, as the statute was, with the form of the instrument, and enacting that, if a name which appeared as payee on the face of the instrument was a fictitious person, the bill may be treated as payable to bearer, it expressed in popular words, though perhaps not very felicitously chosen, its meaning accordingly. For these reasons I am of opinion that, on this ground also, the judgment of the court below was wrong and ought to be reversed, and I so move your Lordships.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE.—If the bills in question in this case had been genuine, really signed by Vucina in favour of C. Petridi & Co., and if the endorsements only had been forged, the case would have been governed by Robarts v. Tucker (4). But the signatures of Vucina were forged; the use of the name of C. Petridi & Co. as payees was part of the fiction; they were not in any true sense payees; and the bills were, nevertheless, accredited by the plaintiffs to the bank as genuine, and as coming forward, like other genuine bills of Vucina, for payment in due course, on days specified in the plaintiffs' letters of advice; and their payment as such, was expressly directed by the plaintiffs. When I speak of the plaintiffs' letters of advice I do not forget that the effect of acceptances payable upon the face of the bills at the Bank of England might, perhaps, have been the same, but in this case there were both; and I think it unnecessary to consider whether the addition of the one form of direction to the other made any difference. If it did not, the effect of the letters of advice cannot on that account be less.

A This state of things appears to me to raise a question which was not decided in Robarts v. Tucker (4) or in any other case cited at the Bar. It is (as Robarts v. Tucker (4) was) a question between the plaintiffs as principals and the bank as their agent, and not between any parties to the bills. If the plaintiffs misled the bank upon a material point, however innocently, and although they were themselves deceived by the fraud which had been committed, I think that they, and not
B the bank, ought to bear the loss which has been the consequence. Here there was never any real holder of these bills, by whom they could have been endorsed, or any outstanding liability from which a discharge was necessary. Your Lordships have to deal with the case of an agent, not claiming any title to or interest in the bills, but instructed by his principal to pay them. It is convenient to speak of them as bills; but, properly speaking, they had not (though they seemed to have, and were represented by the plaintiffs as having) that character; they were accepted
C as such; but there was no real drawer and no real payee; and they were never negotiated.

It is not (as I understand) disputed that there might, as between banker and customer, be circumstances which would be an answer to the prima facie case that the authority was only to pay to the order of the person named as payee upon the bill, and that the banker can only charge the customer with payments made
D pursuant to that authority. Negligence on the customer's part might be one of those circumstances; the fact that there was no real payee might be another; and I think that a representation made directly to the banker by the customer upon a material point, untrue in fact (though believed by the person who made it to be true), and on which the banker acted by paying money which he would not otherwise have paid, ought also to be an answer to that prima facie case. If the bank
E acted upon such a representation in good faith, and according to the ordinary course of business, and a loss had in consequence occurred which would not have happened if the representation had been true, I think that is a loss which the customer, and not the bank, ought to bear. I should be of that opinion, on general principles; and the application of those principles is fortified, to my mind,
F in this particular case by the circumstances under which the forgeries were committed, and the fact that the plaintiffs had large dealings with Vucina going on at the same time with the forgeries, in the course of which they accepted many of his genuine bills, all which were in like manner accredited to and made payable at the bank; and that there were documents in the plaintiffs' possession (the true and the forged letters of advice from Vucina, and the forged bills themselves, when G returned by the bank), from which, if attention had been paid to them, the fraud might have been discovered in an early stage.

I do not see how it can be open to dispute that it was material to the bank to know whether these were genuine or forged bills; or (subject to the consideration of some matters which I postpone) that, in paying the bills as they did without inquiring into the genuineness of the endorsements (which for the present I assume H to have been regular upon the face of them), the bank acted in good faith, and according to the usual, and practically necessary, course of business; or that, if the bills had really been Vucina's, and if C. Petridi & Co. had been real payees, no loss would have been incurred. If it were the duty or the practice of bankers, without special reasons for suspicion, to refuse or delay payment of foreign bills appearing on their face to be regular, and regularly advised for payment by their
I customers, until they could ascertain by inquiry the genuineness of every foreign endorsement, it must continually happen that the bills would not be paid at the proper time and place, and bona fide holders might treat them as dishonoured. It was admitted that it is not in the ordinary course of business to make such inquiries, and I should say that business could not go on if it were so.

No doubt there is, in the ordinary course of business, the possible risk, which occurred in Robarts v. Tucker (4), of a genuine bill being stolen, and presented for payment with a forged endorsement. Between that case and one like the present there is this very substantial difference—that the acceptor, in that case, has not in any way contributed to mislead the bankers; and, when there is a real bona fide payee, the acceptor remains liable to him; but if, when there is no such payee, the person who signs as drawer endorses the bill with the name of a pretended payee, there is no outstanding liability from which a discharge is needed for the acceptor's protection. The risk of a genuine bill being stolen, and presented with a forged endorsement, is one which, being of rare occurrence, and distributed over a large amount of business, bankers may be willing to run. But they are entitled to judge for themselves what risks they will run, and the customer is not, in my opinion, entitled to tell the banker (in effect) that the risk is an ordinary one, and, when it turns out to be otherwise, to put upon him another, which, if the truth had been known, the banker, with his eyes open, would not have undertaken. When, as in this case, the customer accredits the bills as genuine, and as coming forward in due course against him for payment on certain days, the banker must, I think, be considered to undertake the risk incident to bills of that description, and no more. If this would be true of a single bill, much more of a series of bills of large amount, all successively authenticated to the banker in like manner by the customer who orders them to be paid. The judgment under appeal puts upon the bank a risk which it never was called upon, and never agreed, to undertake.

It seems to me also clear, as a matter of fact and without reference to the question under the Bills of Exchange Act, that the Constantinople firm of C. Petridi & Co. were never, in any true sense, payees of these bills, and that their genuine endorsements could never have appeared upon them without an additional fraud. The suggestions at the Bar, as to conceivable ways in which such endorsements might have been obtained, were, in my judgment, irrelevant to the real facts, with reference to which, and not to merely imaginable possibilities, this case ought to be determined. In Stone v. Freeland (5) and Cooper v. Meyer (6), a real firm, Butler & Co., and a real person, Woodman, were named as payees; but the courts did not hold that enough to make the firm or the person so named a real payee. If the question were merely one of legal estoppel against the acceptor, it may be true that the estoppel would be only against denying the genuineness of the drawer's signature; or, if the acceptor knew that there was no real payee, against insisting that the bill must receive an endorsement which he knew to be impossible. But these are authorities, relevant so far as general principles are concerned, which even as between parties to a negotiable instrument seem to me to go beyond legal estoppel. I cannot but think it an extension of that doctrine to hold, as was done in Cooper v. Meyer (6), that, when the bill is payable to the drawer's order, the acceptor, because he is supposed to know the drawer's signature, is bound by the subsequent endorsement of the person who forged the signature as drawer, as well as by that original signature. And I am not convinced that estoppel is a sufficient explanation of the cases in which the drawer of a cheque has been held bound by fraudulent alterations, for which the state of the paper afforded space. The drawer was ignorant of, and could hardly be bound to anticipate, the subsequent fraud.

But, if it were universally true that the liability of an acceptor to a bona fide holder of a bill, in all such cases, depends upon legal estoppel, I do not think it would follow that the discharge of a banker, or other agent employed by the acceptor to pay the bill, must depend, under similar circumstances, upon that principle only. If in the present case the plaintiffs, instead of making their acceptances payable at the Bank of England, had directed, in the same terms, a managing clerk in their own office, ignorant of the fraud, to pay those acceptances, and to take for that purpose the necessary money from their cash-box, and if the clerk so authorised had paid the bills, exactly as the Bank of England did, not indeed to Glyka himself, but to someone acting for him, and presenting them in any manner not irregular, I cannot doubt that the clerk, so acting in good faith, would have been exonerated. A banker undertakes to do what is in the proper course of a banker's business, and so far differs from an agent who is not a banker; but beyond this I see no principle for putting him in a worse position than any other

A agent. In Bennett v. Farnell (7) LORD ELLENBOROUGH held that, when the payee was fictitious, and the acceptor did not know it, the bill was neither to order nor to bearer, but was completely void. If, in such a case, the acceptor had directed his bankers to pay the bill, and the bankers had paid it in good faith upon an endorsement regular upon its face, though fictitious in fact, the bankers would have been, in my judgment, entitled to credit in account for what they so paid. What-
B ever might have been, before the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the materiality of the acceptor's knowledge or ignorance on such a point, as between himself and a bona fide holder of the bill, I should not have thought it material as between him and his bankers paying the bill under such circumstances.

I have come to this conclusion without resting my opinion upon the statute of 1882. Assuming the present case not to be expressly ruled by that statute, it is
C also, in my judgment, not ruled by any former authority. And I cannot but think that the statute, so far as it does rule certain other cases in pari materia and not well distinguished from this in principle, is as proper to be taken into account as any of the authorities which preceded it as to the acceptor's knowledge or ignorance when there is not a real payee. But it was insisted that, in paying these bills as they did, the bank deviated from the proper course of business, and ought to be
D held affected with notice that the endorsements were fraudulent. The first point relied upon for that purpose was that the bills, drawn as they were for large sums, were all presented and paid across the counter, and not through any bankers. This was admitted to be "unusual" in the evidence for the bank; but it was not, as I read the evidence, either admitted or otherwise proved that it was irregular or E sufficient in itself to excite a suspicion that there was something wrong, although it was unusual in the sense of not often happening. No authority was produced to show that it was irregular according to the law merchant; and if not, and if the payments were bona fide made, without any actual suspicion on the part of the officers of the bank, I cannot think it enough to defeat their right to charge the plaintiffs with those payments that they did not take a precaution not required by the law merchant, and on which they could not have insisted without the risk
F of the bills being treated by bona fide holders as dishonoured. In Roberts v. Tucker (4) payment through a banker was no protection to the defendants.

Some of these bills were, in fact, referred by the counter clerks of the bank before payment to Mr. Disney, the principal in the private drawing office of the bank; not, as I understand the evidence, because of any suspicion, but because they had received general instructions that any cheques or bills of large amount
G should be so referred. Mr. Disney, the truth of whose evidence I see no reason to doubt, thought that, if the bill was advised, as it was, the counter clerk must pay it; and Mr. Ziffo, the plaintiffs' outdoor manager, to whom, on his coming to the bank on other business in June, 1887, Mr. Disney mentioned the fact that such bills had been presented across the counter, and paid in bank-notes, expressed the same opinion. This happened when not more than four of the bills, amounting
H altogether to £3,000, had been presented and paid. When, from time to time, the plaintiffs' pass-book was sent to them, the bills then paid, and debited in it against the plaintiffs, were returned with it; and they remained from thenceforth in the plaintiffs' possession. It was apparent, upon the face of them, that all those bills had been paid across the counter; but no objection was taken by the plaintiffs, on that or any other ground; and similar bills, to a continually increasing and
I ultimately very large amount, were afterwards from time to time advised, and came forward and were paid in like manner. I cannot hold that these circumstances are sufficient to deprive the bank of any right which they would otherwise have had to charge those payments to the plaintiffs' account.

The other point urged at your Lordships' Bar, but not apparently before either of the courts below, was that, according to the statement of Mr. Kurz, the plaintiffs' deputy manager, in cross-examination, the course of post between London and Constantinople was four days; and nineteen out of the forty-three forged bills paid by the bank purported to be endorsed at Constantinople on the third day before the date of acceptance in London. No question was put on that subject to any other witness; and of the dates appearing on the bills the plaintiffs also had notice when they were returned. One of those of which the endorsement was on the third day before acceptance was the fifth in the whole series. I think it would not be right in this state of the evidence, and upon a point which, though open upon the plaintiffs' pleading in their reply, was for some reason not pressed in the courts below, to treat the bank as having had notice that the endorsements were not regular. A B

The judgments in the courts below, of the weight of which, as well as of the opinions agreeing with them which I know some of your Lordships to entertain, I am fully sensible, seem to have been addressed to two questions only, that of the proper construction and effect of s. 7 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and that of negligence on the plaintiffs' part. As to the Bills of Exchange Act, I am not prepared to say that CHARLES, J., and the majority of the judges in the Court of Appeal were wrong in holding that the words of the statute, "where the payee is a fictitious or non-existing person," do not extend to the case of a real person, falsely represented as payee upon a forged bill, though in principle the cases seem to me much the same. The difficulty, to my mind, arises out of the fact that the legislature has here described "a person" as "fictitious or non-existing," instead of saying "where the payee is fictitious or non-existing," and it has been increased, rather than removed, by reference to other parts of the statute, particularly ss. 5 (2), 24, 41 (1), 46 (2), 50 (2), and 54 (2). I cannot, however, agree with the opinion that in the cases which do fall within s. 7 (3) knowledge on the part of the acceptor that the payee is a fictitious or non-existing person is still necessary. Such a qualification of the express words of the statute cannot properly, in my judgment, be implied from the earlier authorities, which treated knowledge as necessary. Those authorities were, no doubt, within the view of the legislature; and, all reference to the necessity of knowledge being here omitted, I think the omission must be taken to have been deliberate and intentional, and that there is no sound principle on which what is so omitted can be supplied by construction. I think it right to add that, in point of principle, it seems to me neither unjust nor unreasonable that the rights and liabilities of third parties should, in such a case, depend upon the facts rather than upon an inquiry into the acceptor's state of mind. C D E F

As to the other point, my opinion does not rest upon mere negligence, but on what seems to me higher ground. Upon that ground I find myself compelled, notwithstanding my sincere respect for the opinions from which I differ, to give my voice in the appellants' favour. The amount in controversy is large; the question is one of much importance both to the parties and to bankers and their customers generally; and it is not, in my judgment, covered by any previous authority. Roberts v. Tucker (4) is, no doubt, law; but I am not for extending it, as it seems to me to be extended by the order under appeal. G

LORD WATSON.—The bank and Vagliano Brothers appear to me to have been equally innocent, in this sense, that they entertained no suspicion that the forged documents which have given rise to this action were other than genuine bills of exchange; and also that nothing wittingly done, or omitted to be done by them, in the conduct of their respective businesses, as bankers and financiers, can reasonably be regarded as the proximate occasion of Glyka's forgeries, or of the success which attended them. Which of these innocent parties must bear the loss resulting from Glyka's frauds is the only question to be determined in this appeal. It seems to have been assumed by all the learned judges in the courts below, that, in making payment of the bills in question on behalf of the acceptors, the bank was under the same legal obligation to ascertain the identity of the payee which was held to attach to the defendants in Roberts v. Tucker (4). That assumption, which is really the basis of the judgments appealed from, does not appear to me to be well founded. H I

A The decision of the Queen's Bench in Roberts v. Tucker (4) has, ever since its date, been accepted in mercantile practice as determining the obligations incumbent upon bankers who agree to retire acceptances on account of their customers. It casts upon them the whole duty of ascertaining the identity of the person to whom they make payment with the payee whose name is upon the bill. They may pay in good faith to the wrong person, in circumstances by which the acceptor himself, or men of ordinary prudence, might have been misled; but they cannot take credit for such a payment in any question with the acceptor. It has been said by one of the learned judges that the rule is a harsh one, and it is possible that in some instances it may operate harshly; but it appears to me to be settled beyond dispute, and I see no reason for suggesting any doubt that it puts a reasonable construction upon the contract constituted by the agreement of the banker to pay his customers' acceptances when they fall due. In the absence of any special stipulations it construes the arrangement so constituted as importing that, on the one hand, the customer is to furnish or repay to the banker the funds necessary to meet his obligations as acceptor, and that, on the other hand, the banker undertakes to apply the money provided by the customer, or advanced on his account, so as to extinguish the liability created by his acceptance. Accordingly, no payment made by the banker which leaves the liability of the acceptor undischarged can be debited to the latter.

The ratio of the judgment in Roberts v. Tucker (4) does not carry the liability of the banker beyond this point—that his undertaking to retire bills genuine in their inception on behalf of acceptors who, by signing in that character, became immediately indebted to the payees, implies an obligation on his part to discharge their debt, which he can only do by making payment to the proper creditor. It would obviously require a considerable extension of the principle in order to make it apply to documents purporting to be bills of exchange, in which the drawer's signature is a forgery, the payee a person who is not intended to be a holder, and the genuine signature of the acceptor has been procured by fraud. His signing such a document creates no legal obligation against the acceptor; although it is possible that he may be estopped from pleading his non-liability, if and when the document has come into the hands of a bona fide holder for value. I venture to doubt whether the payee, whose name was fraudulently inserted, could ever occupy that position; because the occurrence of his own name in the original tenor of the bill would be sufficient notice to him that something was wrong, and called for inquiry. At the time when Glyka's bills were presented for payment, they did not raise, and never had raised, any liability against Vagliano Brothers, although the latter informed the bank that they were liable and willing to pay; and when the bills had been paid by the bank and returned to them, there remained no debt due to Vagliano Brothers, which would have been the consequence of the bank's making an erroneous payment of a genuine bill.

The risk of error attending the payment of bills supposed to be genuine, which are wholly counterfeit with the exception of the drawee's signature, is materially greater than the risk attending the payment of honest bills. In the latter case the danger of imposition can only arise from the document of debt having been stolen or fraudulently obtained from the true owner; whereas, in the former, the document, never having been in the possession of a real owner, will almost, as matter of certainty, be used for the purpose of deceiving the acceptor or the bank acting as his agent. In the ordinary course of business, it is very difficult for a banker, who has no reason for suspecting fraud, to make an exhaustive inquiry in the case of each bill, as to the identity of the person by whom it is presented, without exposing himself to claims of damage.

But experience has shown that the number of genuine bills which get into dishonest hands, and are erroneously paid, is comparatively insignificant, and does not materially affect profits derived from the business of retiring bills on account of the acceptor. Again, it is wellnigh impossible that a regular system of appropriating genuine bills, in all of which the drawee, payee, and acceptor are the same, and of obtaining payment by means of forged endorsements, could be carried on for any length of time without discovery. If the series of documents forged by Glyka had been genuine drafts by Vucina in favour of Petridi & Co., it is hardly conceivable that even the ingenuity of Glyka would have enabled him to get possession of no less than forty-three of these bills, and to obtain payment of their contents at intervals extending over a period of eight months. In that case it is probable, if not certain, that detection would have followed at an early stage of his frauds; because the real payee would have discovered the loss of each bill as it fell due, and would have taken measures to stop payment. It appears to me to be beyond dispute that the bank paid Glyka's spurious bills under the belief that they were genuine commercial drafts, and that their payment was attended with no greater risk of error than is incidental to the cashing of genuine bills. It would be ridiculous to suggest that the bank would have dealt as they did with these bills, had it not been for the existence of that erroneous belief. The very fact that no payee complained of having lost a bill payable at their office, or of their having made payment to the wrong person, was well calculated to assure the bank that they had made and were making payment of all Vagliano Brothers' acceptances to the proper creditors.

It is, in my opinion, unnecessary to consider what would have been the precise extent of the implied obligation of the bank to Vagliano Brothers, with reference to these forged bills, if the latter had been unconnected with the belief upon which the bank acted, because that belief was induced and warranted by their representations. Their acceptances, if genuine, were in themselves distinct assurances, upon which the bank was entitled to rely, that each bill bearing their signature was a real draft upon them by their correspondent Vucina; and the notes sent by them to the bank, from time to time, directing payment of the bills, were so many renewals of the same representation, strengthened by the further assurance that their acceptances were genuine. Throughout these transactions the bank acted in good faith as the agents of Vagliano; and the errors into which they were betrayed were mainly, if not wholly, attributable to their having treated the bills as genuine, in reliance upon the representations of their principals, which were untrue. I think that, in these circumstances, Vagliano Brothers cannot be permitted to cast upon the bank liability for errors arising from their own representations. These representations were no doubt made in the honest belief that they were true; but that circumstance cannot, in my opinion, avail Vagliano Brothers in the present question with their agents.

These considerations are sufficient for the disposal of this appeal; but, on considering the opinions which have already been expressed, and are yet to be delivered by your Lordships, I think it right to state my opinion with regard to the construction of s. 7 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Upon that point I concur in the reasoning of LORD HERSCHELL. I think that the language of the sub-section, taken in its ordinary significance, imports that a bill may be treated as payable to bearer in all cases where the person designated as payee on the face of it is either non-existing, or, being in existence, has not, and never was intended to have, any right to its contents. The enactment has reference to real bills only, and has no direct application to these documents of Glyka's manufacture, which were not bills in their inception, and never acquired the force of bills by virtue of estoppel. But the fact that the payees were fictitious within the meaning of the statute affords a good answer to Vagliano Brothers' contention that the bank was bound to deal with these documents on the same footing as if they had been real bills, and ought not to have paid except upon genuine endorsements by Petridi & Co. For these reasons I concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD BRAMWELL.—The plaintiffs are merchants and agents or bankers for foreign traders. They kept a banking account with the defendant bank. That is to say, they (the plaintiffs) paid to their credit with the bank money, technically

A lent it, and doubtless delivered to them other assets, drew cheques on them, and addressed accepted bills to them for payment. The plaintiffs claim of the defendants a large balance. The defendants admit the credit side of the account, but say they have paid bills accepted by the plaintiffs addressed to them, the defendants. It is immaterial, but this is not technically a set-off, for the defendants never could have maintained an action against the plaintiffs in respect of these payments. The plaintiffs never owed the bank anything. I say this is immaterial, but it is as well to be technical. Set-off or not, there is no doubt but that the defendants have, as they allege, paid bills accepted by the plaintiffs, and addressed payable at the defendants' equal to the amount claimed; but they have paid them to persons who could not have enforced payment of them from the plaintiffs. They were bills on which the plaintiffs were not liable to the holder, and which, if presented to them, they need not and possibly would not have paid. The drawing and endorsements on them were forgeries, or fictitious.

It is for the defendants to establish that they have a right to charge the plaintiffs with the amount of these bills. The first ground on which they claim this right is that the plaintiffs by their conduct, wilful, careless, or unskilful, or all, enabled the fraud to be committed as to the whole or part, the part after the first one or two—in effect, that the plaintiffs caused the defendants to pay these bills. I think it is necessary for the defendants to show that the plaintiffs caused them to pay these bills as they did. It is not enough to show that they gave occasion to their doing so, that different conduct would have prevented the fraud and the payment by the defendants. I think the result of the authorities, Robarts v. Tucker (4), Young v. Grote (8), Bank of Ireland (Governor & Co.) v. Evans' Charities Trustees (2), and Staple of England (Mayor, etc., of Merchants of the) v. Bank of England (Governor) (3), is that the conduct of the bank's customer, to enable the bank to charge the customer, must be conduct directly causing the payment.

There is no doubt that there were many ways in which the plaintiffs might have detected the forgeries. The forged letters which advised the forged bills omitted to advise some which were genuine. Yet the latter were accepted by the plaintiffs. The letters of the plaintiffs to Vucina did not mention the forged bills. The plaintiffs signed a letter to Vucina, in which the balance against him was in blank; that balance seems to have appeared in different amounts in the plaintiffs' books at different times. Then the forged bills were all endorsed on the part accepted, unlike the genuine bills. The bills after payment, had they been examined by the plaintiffs, would have shown that they had not been paid through a banker. The endorsements would have been known to the plaintiffs' clerks and the plaintiffs to bear impossible dates. It would have been seen that Pasqua appeared to leave the bills for acceptance, and yet not to be holder for payment. Maratis was a fictitious name, and would not be known to the plaintiffs. Vucina's account became very large, the balance against him unusually large, but no notice was taken; and what was much pressed was that Glyka was enabled to steal, and did steal, the forged bills after their acceptance. It was not the duty of anyone exclusively, apparently, to give out bills accepted to those who called for them. I suppose, as that call might be at any time in the day, any clerk might go to the leather case, take out the bill, and give it out. It was kept in the room where Glyka sat. Whether this was negligence I cannot say. I really do not know; no witness said it was; it may be unusual; I say sincerely, I do not know; I cannot of my own knowledge or reasoning say it was, and there is no evidence.

All these things put together make it wonderful that the fraud could be practised; most wonderful that it could be practised to the extent it was without earlier discovery, but do not, in my opinion, give the defendants a right to charge the plaintiffs with the amounts paid for these bills, as payments caused by them. A great deal has been made of the advice notes the plaintiffs sent to the defendants of bills becoming due, with a request to the defendants to pay them. In my judgment, these advice notes in no way help the defendants. They mean nothing more than the very acceptances themselves meant. The bills are accepted, payable at the defendants', but to whom? To those entitled to enforce payment. That is all the advice notes mean. Suppose a genuine bill really drawn by Vucina, and really payable to Petridi, and suppose a forgery of Petridi's name, can it be suggested that the advice note would enable the defendants to charge the plaintiffs with that bill if they paid it? Certainly not. With all respect, it is a mistake to suppose that by that, or by the very acceptance itself, any more or other representation is made by the plaintiffs to the defendants than that they, the plaintiffs, are estopped to anyone interested to deny that Vucina drew the bill. The plaintiffs are not estopped from saying that they are not liable to pay the bill unless it is endorsed by Petridi. I am afraid, though, that that memorandum operates strongly on some opinions. A B

The other ground on which the defendants claim to charge the plaintiffs with the amount of these bills is that Petridi & Co., the payees, were fictitious persons within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act, s. 7 (3), and that the defendants, therefore, might pay them to a de facto bearer. I differ on both points. It must be borne in mind that the Bills of Exchange Act is "an Act to codify the law relating to bills of exchange," not to alter or amend it; and by s. 97 the rules of common law, including the law merchant, "save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act, shall continue to apply to bills of exchange." C D
Were Petridi & Co. fictitious or non-existent persons? There was a firm of that name—a firm as identifiable as N. M. Rothschild & Co., Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co., or the Bank of England itself would be identifiable if their names appeared as payees of a bill of exchange; and, to my mind, that shows they were not fictitious or non-existing persons. It is asked: What if the payee were John Smith? Well, if there were nothing to identify a particular John Smith as payee when all "the surrounding circumstances" were looked at, it may be that he might be treated as a non-existent person. But what if it was shown that the bill was delivered to a particular John Smith, in payment of a debt due to him from the drawer, could any holder of it treat it as payable to bearer, Smith's name being forged as endorser? Certainly not. But then it is said that that is not the case here; that the bill was not delivered to Petridi & Co., nor intended to be so; that, in the intention of the makers of the bill, Petridi was a sham and so fictitious or non-existent; that Petridi & Co. are not fictitious nor non-existent; that they exist in the flesh, yet they are fictitious qua payees, constructively fictitious; that if Vucina had drawn the bill, Petridi was real and existent, but inasmuch as Glyka did not mean Petridi to have the bill he was non-existent. This beats me. They are at the same time real and unreal. The bill means one thing or another, according to the intent of the drawer; that the drawee has, or has not, a right to Petridi's endorsement, according as that intent is one thing or another. Because the argument would be the same if Vucina had really drawn the bills, but not intended Petridi to have them; a possibility, if Vucina will forgive me. That if Glyka had intended to commit his fraud through the innocent agency of Petridi, Petridi would be real and not fictitious. If the argument is good it would show that a bona fide holder of these bills, not claiming through Petridi, might have enforced payment from the plaintiffs. It is said that such a payment—that is, to himself—is according to the intention of the drawer. So it is of the drawer de facto, but not of him who, by the bill itself, the drawee has a right to suppose is the drawer. The plaintiffs are estopped to deny that Vucina is the drawer, but they are not estopped to deny that Vucina meant that Petridi and his assigns should receive the amount of the bill, and that it should not be paid unless endorsed by Petridi. E F G H I

This argument, as I have said, makes the effect of a bill depend, not on the meaning of the writing, but on the intent of the maker. A bill payable to the Bank of England is payable to a fictitious person if the drawer intends to forge their name and give it to another person. A payee is real or fictitious at the option of the holder within the Act. But it was shown that a bill drawn like these might get into the hands of Petridi & Co., though not so intended, who might take it for value, and be entitled to maintain an action against the plaintiffs. Would Petridi

A be fictitious then? It is asked: What difference does it make to the plaintiffs that there is a C. Petridi & Co., when, if the payee had been actually fictitious or unreal, and the name was put on the back of the bill, it might be treated as payable to bearer? The answer is obvious. If the payee is a known person, the drawee can well believe that the drawing is genuine; he knows he cannot be made to pay without that person's endorsement. He knows that before presentment for acceptance the bill has been in ordinary course, or at all events will be in the hands of a responsible person if a good name is used. His holding and endorsement are a guarantee that the bill is in right hands. Take this very case. Glyka could not have got Petridi's endorsement. I do not mean could not in point of law, but could not practically. Without that the plaintiffs were not bound to pay the bill. I have no doubt that Glyka chose Petridi's name to avoid suspicion. If it

C had been a strange name it might have attracted attention and caused some inquiry.

An argument is used which, with all submission, I think very feeble. It is said that the statute says "fictitious or non-existing," and that fictitious is needless on the plaintiffs' construction. I do not agree. But what is the value of such an argument? Nothing; unless there is no other. A prudent draftsman does not accurately examine whether a word will be superfluous; he makes sure by using it.

D A word on Cooper v. Meyer (6). It is somewhat remarkable. The question was important; the judgment is singularly short, and nothing is said by PARK, J. I think the decision right. LORD TENTERDEN says, when the drawer is a real person, his endorsement may be disputed, but if there is no such person, and (BAYLEY, J., also says) if the acceptor accepts without knowing there is such a person as the supposed drawer, the acceptor undertakes to pay to the signature of the person

E who actually drew the bills. Further, I should say that, as the bills were accepted for the accommodation of Darby, with no knowledge of any such person as the drawer, the acceptor authorised the endorsement as he authorised the drawing by Darby. The court did not say that no endorsement was necessary, or that anyone but Darby could have endorsed. This case does not help the defendants.

I say, then, that Petridi & Co. were not fictitious or non-existent, and that the

F bill could not be treated as payable to bearer. But supposing it could, by whom could it be so treated? By the holder in due course; by the person who could maintain an action. Not by a man who stole it; not by a man who could maintain no action on it; the enactment is for the benefit of the holder; the honest holder who is embarrassed by the difficulties of there being no actual existing payee. Section 5 (2) says that when drawer and drawee are the same person, or the

G drawee fictitious, or a person not having capacity to contract, the holder may treat the instrument as a bill or a promissory note—surely that means a holder for value. Suppose A. draws on a fictitious person, endorses it to B. for his accommodation, who negotiates it and has to take it up. B. could not say: "The statute says I may treat this as a promissory note." The answer would be: "You are not a holder for value." In the present case the money was always paid by the

H defendants to Glyka, or Glyka's agents. Glyka had no right to "treat" the bill in any way. It was in his possession by a theft. He clearly stole it after it was accepted. The enactment, I say, is for the benefit of the holder, not of the acceptor; it gives rights against him. The plaintiffs could not, even if Petridi is considered as fictitious, treat these bills as payable to bearer. How could they? How can an acceptor treat a bill as payable to bearer? But if he cannot, if the

I section does not apply to him, neither does it apply to his agent for payment, his banker, at whose house it is made payable.

How can it be said that the plaintiffs have given a mandate to the defendants to pay these bills without Petridi's endorsement, to pay them to a person who had no right to receive the money, who could not have compelled the plaintiffs to pay them? These bills, as the acceptance was not "payable at the bank, and not elsewhere," might have been presented to the plaintiffs. Had they been, the plaintiffs could have refused payment, perhaps would. No one could have maintained an action against the plaintiffs on these bills. How can it be right that the defendants should have paid them? If a clerk of the plaintiffs had paid this bill, I agree that he would not be liable unless suspicion had been created. But his duty differs from that of a banker. The defendants have deprived themselves of this right to refuse payment by electing to pay. Let it not be supposed I find fault with them, but so it is. A

I am of opinion that this case is governed by Roberts v. Tucker (4). I own to a prejudice in favour of that case. I do not agree with the notion that a banker is entitled to make inquiries whether he should pay, as there suggested. He must honour or dishonour the bill on presentment. The case was decided on no such ground, but on this—that the customer's mandate is to pay only to such person or persons as can give a discharge of the instrument. I am afraid, however, that a dislike of that case has a good deal to do with opinions unfavourable to the plaintiffs. LORD ESHER says that is a harsh case. I have heard able arguments on both sides. On the one side, that the banker sees the person who presents the instrument; on the other, that the banker's customer knows the parties to whom he gives his acceptance or cheque. There are two remarks to be made. One is, that the banker can bargain with his customer that he will not be liable in such cases as the present. The other is that bankers do not make such a bargain; yet they and banking, I am glad to say, flourish. B C D

I have said nothing of the defendants paying this enormous amount over the counter to strangers. I have no doubt, as a matter of knowledge and of reasoning, that this was most unusual. There is, besides, cogent evidence that it was. The paying cashier inquired of his principal if the bill should be paid when first presented. The principal, according to his own account, thought it a thing to mention to the plaintiffs' clerk when the instances had been few. I have no doubt that (especially when the cases multiplied), instead of a gossiping intimation not enough to reach Ziffo's mind (as CHARLES, J., finds), for the protection of themselves there ought to have been a formal communication to the plaintiffs. If Mr. Disney was satisfied with what he says Ziffo said to him, he is a very strange person. The thing is absurd. "I suppose you must pay if they have been advised." How could the advice that the bills would be presented for payment remove the suspiciousness of the presentment when it took place? True, the plaintiffs might have seen that the bills had been paid over the counter, but they trusted to the defendants having paid properly. E F

But I have not referred to this as a ground on which the defendants should fail. I have no doubt there was gross carelessness, but a carelessness to the bank's own hurt, a carelessness of precautions to their own good. If, however, on some ground which I cannot see, the whole conduct of the parties is to be looked at; if it is to be said that the bank may charge Vagliano with payments they need not have made, then I think that must, at least, be limited to those payments which were reasonably and carefully made, and not to such as those in question. I rely also on, and agree with, the judgments of the judges who have decided in favour of the plaintiffs; also on that of the Master of the Rolls, except that part which holds that C. Petridi & Co. were fictitious. This is my opinion, I am glad to think also that of LORD FIELD, and am sorry to think that it is not shared by any other noble Lord. We are probably wrong, but it is some comfort to me to think that the head-note of our opinions may be expressed in the most abstract form—namely: "A banker cannot charge his customer with the amount of a bill paid to a person who had no right of action against the customer." The head-note of your Lordships' opinions should be in a strictly concrete form stating the facts, and that on them it was held that judgment should be for the appellants, and I say this with sincere respect for those who differ from me. G H I

LORD HERSCHELL.—I propose to deal at the outset with the question of the construction of the Bills of Exchange Act, which gave rise to a difference of opinion in the court below. The conclusion at which the majority of the Court of Appeal

A arrived with reference to the construction of s. 7 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act is thus stated :

B "The word 'fictitious' must in each case be interpreted with due regard to the person against whom the bill is sought to be enforced. If the drawer is the person against whom the bill is to be treated as a bill payable to bearer, the term fictitious may be satisfied if it is fictitious as regards himself, or, in other words, fictitious to his knowledge. If the obligations of the acceptor are in question, and the acceptor is the person against whom the bill is to be so treated, fictitious must mean fictitious as regards the acceptor, and to his knowledge. Such an interpretation is based on good sense and sound commercial principle."

C The conclusion thus expressed was founded upon an examination of the state of the law at the time the Bills of Exchange Act was passed. The prior authorities were subjected by the learned judges who concurred in this conclusion to an elaborate review, with the result that it was established to their satisfaction that a bill made payable to a fictitious person or his order was, as against the acceptor, in effect a bill payable to bearer only when the acceptor was aware of the circumstance that the payee was a fictitious person, and further that his liability in that case depended upon an application of the law of estoppel. It appeared to those learned judges that if the exception was to be further extended it would rest upon no principle, and that they might well pause before holding that s. 7 (3) of the statute was "intended not merely to codify the existing law, but to alter it and to introduce so remarkable and unintelligible a change."

E With sincere respect for the learned judges who have taken this view, I cannot bring myself to think that this is the proper way to deal with such a statute as the Bills of Exchange Act, which was intended to be a code of the law relating to negotiable instruments. I think the proper course is, in the first instance, to examine the language of the statute and to ask what is its natural meaning uninfluenced by any considerations derived from the previous state of the law, and not to start with inquiring how the law previously stood, and then, assuming that it was probably intended to leave it unaltered, to see if the words of the enactment will bear an interpretation in conformity with this view. If a statute intended to embody in a code a particular branch of the law is to be treated in this fashion, it appears to me that its utility will be almost entirely destroyed, and the very object with which it was enacted will be frustrated. The purpose of such a statute surely was that on any point specifically dealt with by it the law should be ascertained by interpreting the language used, instead of, as before, by roaming over a vast number of authorities in order to discover what the law was, extracting it by a minute critical examination of the prior decisions, dependent upon a knowledge of the exact effect even of an obsolete proceeding such as a demurrer to evidence.

H I am, of course, far from asserting that resort may never be had to the previous state of the law for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the provisions of the code. If, for example, a provision be of doubtful import, such resort would be perfectly legitimate. Or again, if in a code of the law of negotiable instruments words be found which have previously acquired a technical meaning, or been used in a sense other than their ordinary one, in relation to such instruments, the same interpretation might well be put upon them in the code. I give these as examples merely; they do not, of course, exhaust the category. What, however, I am venturing to insist upon is, that the first step taken should be to interpret the language of the statute, and that an appeal to earlier decisions can only be justified on some special ground.

I One further remark I have to make before I proceed to consider the language of the statute. The Bills of Exchange Act was certainly not intended to be merely a code of the existing law. It is not open to question that it was intended to alter, and did alter, it in certain respects. And I do not think that it is to be presumed that any particular provision was intended to be a statement of the existing law rather than a substituted enactment. A

Turning now to the words of s. 7 (3), I confess they appear to me to be free from ambiguity. "Where the payee is a fictitious or non-existent person" means, surely, according to ordinary canons of construction, in every case where this can, as a matter of fact, be predicated of the payee. I can find no warrant in the statute itself for inserting any limitation or condition. I am putting aside for the present the question by whom a bill answering the description of the sub-section may be treated as payable to bearer, and I am accepting, too, for the moment, the meaning attributed by the majority of the Court of Appeal to the word "fictitious"—viz., a creation of the imagination, confining myself to the question in what cases a bill purporting on the face of it to be payable to order may be treated as payable to bearer. I find it impossible, without doing violence to the language of the statute, to give any other answer than this—in all cases in which the payee is a fictitious or non-existent person. The majority of the Court of Appeal read the section thus—where the payee is a fictitious or non-existent person, the bill may, as against any party who had knowledge of the fact, be treated as a bill payable to bearer. It seems to me that this is to add to the words of the statute and to insert a limitation which is not to be found in it or indicated by it. B C D

It is said that when the acceptor is the person against whom the bill is to be treated as payable to bearer, "fictitious must mean fictitious as regards the acceptor, and to his knowledge." With all respect, I am unable to see why it must mean this. I confess I cannot altogether follow the meaning of the word fictitious "as regards" the acceptor. I have a difficulty in seeing how a payee, who is, in fact, a "fictitious" person, in the sense in which that word is being used, can be otherwise than fictitious as regards all the world, how such a payee can be "fictitious" as regards one person and not another. The truth is the words "as regards" the acceptor are treated as equivalent to the words "to the knowledge of," the acceptor. But I do not think these expressions are synonymous. It seems to me that to import into the statute after the words "fictitious person" the words "as regards" the acceptor or drawer, as the case may be, and then to interpret those words as meaning "to the knowledge of" only tends to obscure the fact that the condition that the payee must be fictitious to the knowledge of the person sought to be charged as upon a bill payable to bearer is being introduced into the enactment. E F

For the reasons I have given I find myself compelled to the conclusion, notwithstanding my respect for those who have expressed a contrary view, that in order to establish the right to treat a bill as payable to bearer, it is enough to prove that the payee is in fact a fictitious person, and that it is not necessary, if it be sought to charge the acceptor, to prove in addition that he was cognisant of the fictitious character of the payee. If the conclusion which I have indicated as being, in my opinion, the sound one, involved some absurdity or led to some manifestly unjust result, I might, perhaps, even at the risk of straining the language used, strive to put some other interpretation upon it. But I cannot see that this is so, or that the interpretation I have adopted does any violence to good sense or is otherwise than in accordance with sound commercial principle. G H

I will assume that, as the law stood at the time the Bills of Exchange Act was passed, a bill drawn to the order of a fictitious payee could have been treated as a bill payable to bearer only as against a party who knew that the payee was fictitious. This decision was arrived at little more than a century ago, and was dissented from by distinguished judges, and it is obvious, from the observations of Lord ELLENBOROUGH in Bennett v. Farnell (7) (1 Camp. at p. 180 c.), that by some eminent lawyers at least it was regarded rather as a departure from strict principle, which ought not to be further extended than as an embodiment of sound commercial principle. But is it impossible to take any step beyond this without violating sound principle and working injustice? Let me draw attention for a moment to the relative position and rights of the drawer and acceptor of a bill of I

A exchange. A drawee who accepts a bill does so either because he has in his hands moneys of the drawer or expects to have them before the bill falls due, or because he is willing to give the credit of his name to the drawer, and to make him an advance by payment of his draft. It is immaterial to the acceptor to whom the drawer directs him to make payment, that is a matter for the choice of the drawer alone. The acceptor is only concerned to see that he makes the payment as

B directed so as to be able to charge the drawer. It is, in truth, only with the drawer that the acceptor deals; it is at his instance that he accepts; it is on his behalf that he pays; and it is to him that he looks either for the funds to pay with or for reimbursement, if he holds no funds of the drawer at the time of payment. In the ordinary case, where the payee designated in the bill is a real person intended by the drawer to receive payment, either by himself or by some transferee, the acceptor can only charge the drawer, if he pays the person so designated, or

C someone deriving title through him. If payment be made to any other person, the drawer's liability on the bill is not discharged by payment, he will or may remain liable to the real payee, or those claiming under him, and the acceptor having paid otherwise than according to the directions of the drawer, cannot justify the use of his funds in making the payment or claim to be reimbursed by him.

D But, now, suppose the drawer inserts as payee the name of a fictitious person, requests the drawee to accept a bill so drawn, endorses the payee's name, and puts the bill into circulation. He certainly intended it to obtain currency and to be paid at maturity, and he as certainly did not intend it to be paid only to the payee named, or someone deriving title through him. Nor, as it seems to me, can it reasonably be said that he intended to direct the drawee to pay such person, and

E such person only.

What, then, is the position of a lawful holder of a bill so drawn? I do not understand it to be doubted that even before the Bills of Exchange Act, such a holder could enforce payment of the bill against the drawer, for he not merely knew that the payee designated was a fictitious person, but was himself the author of the fiction. As against the drawer, then, such a bill could be treated as payable

F to bearer. But if it cannot be so treated as against the acceptor, the holder, who, it may be, bought or discounted it on the faith of the acceptance, relying on the credit of the acceptor, and unwilling to trust to that of the drawer alone, is deprived of that upon which he relied, of the liability which he regarded, as his security for payment. The holder in such a case suffers wrong. Would any injustice result if the bill could, as against the acceptor also, be treated as payable

G to bearer? The drawer must be taken to have intended the bill to be paid by the acceptor at maturity, but to whom? Not to the fictitious payee, or someone claiming through him. Why not, then, to the bearer, who can hold the drawer liable upon the bill, and treat it as payable to him? And, if it were the law that the acceptor was bound in such a case to pay the bearer, who would suffer? Not the drawer, for payment would have been made to a person who could compel him

H to make payment, and he could have no ground for complaint if the acceptor used his funds in thus discharging his liability on the bill, or in case he had not provided such funds if he were held liable to reimburse the acceptor. And how would the acceptor suffer in such a case? It was his object in accepting the bill to render himself liable to make payment to the person intended by the drawer to receive it, either out of moneys provided by him, or looking to him for reimbursement. His

I position under such circumstances would be precisely what it would have been if he had made payment to a real person designated as payee, or to those claiming under him. And it might, I think, fairly be said that he was making the payment in accordance with the intention of the drawer. It may be that the right of the holder to treat such a bill, as against an acceptor ignorant of the fictitious character of the payee, as a bill payable to bearer could not be established merely by an appeal to the law of estoppel, and that such estoppel would exist only against the drawer, who knew that the payee was a fictitious person.

I will assume that this was the law prior to the statute. But why should not the legislature have intervened with a positive enactment imposing this liability upon the acceptor, an enactment which, it seems to me, would wrong no one, and would prevent a holder for value from suffering wrong? Estoppel is not the only sound principle upon which a law can be based. The law of estoppel was not thought to afford sufficient protection to those dealing with the apparent owner of goods. The legislature deemed it necessary to intervene, and the Factors Acts were passed, each of which added something to the protection of persons so dealing. Why, then, should it be thought improbable that the legislature should have created in the holder of a bill drawn payable to a fictitious person a new right against the acceptor? If I am correct in thinking that this added right would obviate and not entail injustice, that it would make the law more reasonable, and bring it more into conformity with the course of commercial transactions, I can see no reason for doubting that the legislature so intended, if this be the plain natural meaning of the words they have used, or for endeavouring so to construe the language as to find in it no more than a statement of the previous law. I have dwelt at some length upon this point, because it appeared to me important to show that the words of the enactment might have their natural effect given to them without leading to results either unjust or commercially inconvenient.

But I desired also to elucidate the principle upon which the enactment was, in my opinion, based, because this is not without its bearing upon the next question to be considered, to which I will now pass. It is to my mind one of greater difficulty. Even assuming, it is said, that where the payee is a "fictitious" person the bill may be treated as against the acceptor as a bill payable to bearer, the word "fictitious" is only applicable to a creature of the imagination, having no real existence, while in the present case "C. Petridi & Co." was the name of a firm having a real existence, so that the payee here cannot be termed a "fictitious" person. But are the words "where the payee is a fictitious person" incapable of legitimate application in any other case than that suggested? The first observation I have to make is that, if so, there was no necessity for the introduction of the word "fictitious" in the enactment; the word "non-existent" would have sufficed. It was argued that while a fictitious person is one who has never existed, a non-existent person is one who has existed, but whose existence has ceased. But, even if this be admitted, the word "non-existent" would have sufficed, for it can hardly be doubted that it is employed as suitably in reference to that which has never existed as to that which, having existed, exists no longer.

Without, however, dwelling too much on this point, which may, perhaps, have a historical explanation, let me call attention to the inconvenient complexity and strange and unmeaning distinctions to which, as it seems to me, the construction adopted by the Court of Appeal would give rise. If, for example, a drawer inserts after the words: "Pay to the order of" a name which he invents, himself endorses that name, and puts the bill into circulation, it is within the terms of the statute, and may be treated as a bill payable to bearer. But if he inserts the first name that occurs to him, though he never intends a bearer of that name to be the payee, or that title shall only be made through him, but himself endorses this bill and puts it into circulation just as he did the other, this bill, as I understand the court below, stands in a different position. The case is not within the statute, and if the bill can be treated, even as against the drawer, as a bill payable to bearer, this does not depend upon the words of the enactment, but must result from the rules of the common law, which, in so far as they are not inconsistent with the express provisions of the Act, are by s. 97 (2) still to apply to bills of exchange. It follows that, according to the view of the majority of the Court of Appeal, the legislature has dealt by express enactment with one case of estoppel—that is to say, where the payee is a "fictitious person" in the sense which they attribute to those words, but has left the analogous case, where, though the payee was not fictitious in that sense, the name was inserted as a mere pretence, and without any intention that payment should be made to the person designated, undealt with, and the rights

A and liabilities upon the bill to be ascertained by an appeal to the rules of the common law; certainly a strange proceeding in a code of this description, and one for which it would be difficult to find a satisfactory explanation.

But this is not all. If I am right in thinking that in the case of a payee who is a fictitious person (whatever be the meaning of that expression) a bill may, as against the acceptor, be treated by a lawful holder as payable to bearer, whether the acceptor knew of the fiction or not, why should this right and liability differ according as the name inserted as payee be a creature of the imagination or correspond to that of a real person, the drawer in neither case intending a person so designated to receive payment, and in each case himself endorsing the bill in the name of the nominal payee before putting it into circulation? I am at a loss for any reason why this distinction should exist. It is true that there is this difference between the two cases—that in the one an endorsement by the named payee is physically impossible, while in the other it is not. But I do not think this difference affords a sound basis for a distinction between the respective rights and liabilities of the drawer, acceptor, and holder. It seems to me that it would in each case be reasonable, and on the same grounds, that the acceptor should be liable to the holder of the bill indemnifying himself out of the funds of the drawer or obtaining reimbursement from him.

It must be admitted, of course, that if the language of the statute is not reasonably capable of any other interpretation than that adopted by the majority of the Court of Appeal, if it will not allow of a construction which would cover the case we have been considering, then one must submit to the conclusion that the legislature has left the law in this respect in an unsatisfactory position and full of distinctions devoid of any sound principle. But are we compelled to this conclusion? Do the words "Where the payee is a fictitious person" apply only where the payee named never had a real existence? I take it to be clear that by the word "payee" must be understood the payee named on the face of the bill, for, of course, by the hypothesis there is no intention that payment should be made to any such person. Where, then, the payee named is so named by way of pretence only, without the intention that he shall be the person to receive payment, is it doing violence to language to say that the payee is a fictitious person? I think not. I do not think that the word "fictitious" is exclusively used to qualify that which has no real existence. When we speak of a fictitious entry in a book of accounts we do not mean that the entry has no real existence, but only that it purports to be that which it is not, that it is an entry made for the purpose of pretending that the transaction took place which is represented by it.

G In his report of Stone v. Freeland (5) the learned reporter speaks of there having been in that case "a fictitious endorsement." The facts were that a bill had been drawn payable to Butler & Co. and endorsed in that name. There was a house, Butler & Co., with whom Cox, the drawer, had dealings, but the bill had never been in their hands, and appeared to have been endorsed by Cox. In what sense was the word "fictitious" there used? Not, surely, to convey the idea that the endorsement had no real existence, and was a mere creature of the imagination, but that it was put forward as being that which it was not. Those seem to me to be instances (and other illustrations might be given) of an analogous use of the word "fictitious" to that which, I think, may be attributed to it in the statute. Turning to the interpretation of the word "fictitious" in DR. JOHNSON'S DICTIONARY, I find among the meanings given are, "counterfeit," "feigned." It seems to me, then, that where the name inserted as that of the payee is so inserted by way of pretence only, it may, without impropriety, be said that the payee is a feigned or pretended, or, in other words, a fictitious person. Stress was laid upon the fact that the words of the statute are "where the payee is a fictitious person," and not "where the payee is fictitious." I do not think there is any substantial difference in the meaning of the two phrases. And I cannot conceive that the legislature intended the rights and liabilities arising upon mercantile instruments to depend upon nice distinctions such as this.

For the reasons with which I have troubled your Lordships at some length, I have arrived at the conclusion that whenever the name inserted as that of the payee is so inserted by way of pretence merely, without any intention that payment shall only be made in conformity therewith, the payee is a fictitious person within the meaning of the statute, whether the name be that of an existing person, or of one who has no existence, and that the bill may, in each case, be treated by a lawful holder as payable to bearer. I have hitherto been considering the case of a bill drawn by the person whose name is attached to it as drawer, while the bills which have given rise to this litigation were not drawn by Vucina, who purported to be the drawer, his name being forged by Glyka. I think it was hardly contended on behalf of the respondents that this made any difference. The bills must, under the circumstances, as against the acceptor, be taken to have been drawn by Vucina, and if they have been made payable to a fictitious person within the meaning of the statute, I do not think it is open to question that they may, as against the acceptor, be treated as payable to bearer in every case in which they could have been so treated if Vucina had drawn them. If, in the present case, Vucina had himself drawn the bills, and inserted the name of C. Petridi & Co. as payees as a mere pretence, without intending any such persons to receive payment, it follows from what I have said that, in my opinion, they would have been bills whose payee was a fictitious person, and I do not think they can be regarded as any the less so, in view of the circumstances under which the name of C. Petridi & Co. was inserted.

Assuming, then, that the bills in question are within the sub-section of the Bills of Exchange Act which we are considering, and may, therefore, be treated as bills payable to bearer, the question remains, by whom may they be so treated? By a bona fide holder for value, certainly; and, in considering the construction of the section, I have thus far limited my attention to the case of such a holder. It is the case which ordinarily arises in the course of commercial transactions with negotiable instruments, and it is the one, therefore, which must be taken to have been primarily had in view in framing a law to determine the rights and liabilities in respect of such instruments. But I can see nothing in the words of the enactment to confine their application to this case. It appears to me that the natural answer to the question which I have proposed is this. A bill within the sub-section may be treated as payable to bearer by any person whose rights or liabilities depend upon whether it be a bill payable to order or to bearer.

I, of course, exclude the case of one who is a party to, or who has notice of, a fraud. At all events, I can see no reason why a banker, who has been requested to pay the bill by his customer, the acceptor, may not so treat it. Where the bill is, in truth, payable to order—that is to say, where the drawer intends that payment should be made only to the person named as the payee, or to someone deriving title through him, then the direction of the banker must, since the decision in Robarts v. Tucker (4), be taken to be a direction to pay to such person only. But, where the payee is a fictitious person, within the meaning of the sub-section, I think the direction to the banker must be taken to be to pay the bearer. It is by reason of his filling that character that the holder is entitled to demand payment of the acceptor. And when a banker has been instructed by the acceptor to pay such a bill on his behalf, it is to the person filling that character that he must be taken to have intended the payment to be made. If the holder were a bona fide holder for value, who, if payment had been refused, could hold the acceptor liable, I do not think this could be doubted; and, where the bill is one which might be treated as payable to bearer by a bona fide holder, so that the direction to the banker to pay the bill is a direction to pay the bearer, I do not think that the banker is any the less entitled to charge the payment of the bill against his customer because the bearer, to whom payment is made, holds it under such circumstances that the acceptor could successfully resist a claim for payment by him. It cannot be doubted that this would be so where a bill was in terms payable to bearer, and I do not think there is any sound distinction in the relative position

A of banker and customer between this case and that of a bill which may be treated as payable to bearer.

I cannot think that the view I have indicated works any injustice. It is too late now to question the decision in Robarts v. Tucker (4). It has been long acted upon and regarded as law, though the decision certainly seems to have rested upon the assumption that it was possible for a banker to do that which would be, commercially speaking, absolutely impracticable—namely, to investigate the validity of all the endorsements before he complied with the direction of his customer and paid the bill. In the case there dealt with, however, the complaint of the customer was that the banker had paid the wrong person, leaving him liable to pay the right one. Here the position of the customer is that, in spite of his direction to the banker to pay the bill, he ought not to have made payment to anyone. The conclusion at which I have arrived is exclusively based upon the construction of the terms of the statute, uninfluenced by these considerations; but I am glad to think that it leads to a result which cannot, in my opinion, be regarded as either unjust or commercially inconvenient. The conclusion which I have indicated is sufficient to determine the case in favour of the appellants. I have not found it necessary, therefore, to form a decisive opinion upon the other questions raised; but I do not desire to be understood as dissenting from the view entertained by some of your Lordships, that, apart from the provisions of the statute, the facts of the present case afford sufficient grounds for arriving at the same decision.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—It can hardly be denied that the business of Vagliano Brothers was conducted in rather a loose fashion. There was no check on the clerks. There was no effective supervision over the work of the office. But apart from the error committed in taking the forgeries of a clerk for the signatures of a correspondent whose bills the firm was in the habit of accepting, there was nothing, I think, in the conduct of the business, or in what Vagliano himself did, or omitted to do, which can afford a plausible answer to the plaintiffs' claims. On the other hand, the fact that the sums in question were paid over the counter ought not, I think, to prevent the bank from setting up any defence which would have been available if the money had been paid through another bank. Putting aside these matters, to which a good deal of evidence was directed, the case lies in a narrow compass. But it is one of much difficulty. There is no authority which governs it. Very little assistance is to be derived from reported decisions. And it is by no means easy to apply to Glyka's fabrications rules of law intended for genuine bills of exchange, and principles applicable to honest commercial transactions.

There are, I think, two questions to be considered: (i) Is the bank entitled to be indemnified against the moneys paid in respect of these forged bills, although the bills may not have been paid according to their tenor? (ii) Can the bank treat the bills as payable to bearer, and so justify the payment as being in accordance with their customer's mandate? As regards the first question, the following points are, I think, established: (a) The relation of banker and customer does not of itself, and apart from other circumstances, impose upon a banker the duty of paying his customer's acceptances. If authority is wanted for this proposition it will be found in Robarts v. Tucker (4), where it was said by the court, that,

"if bankers wish to avoid the responsibility of deciding on the genuineness of endorsements, they may require their customers to domicile their bills at their own offices, and to honour them by giving a cheque upon the bankers."

That implies that bankers may refuse to pay their customers' acceptances, and that such refusal is not inconsistent with the relation of banker and customer, or a breach of the banker's duty to his customer. (b) If a banker undertakes the duty of paying his customer's acceptances, the arrangement is the result of some special agreement express or implied. And such an agreement, in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, must have reference solely to genuine bills of exchange. It cannot be supposed to contemplate any dealings with fictitious instruments.

(c) Bankers who undertake the duty of paying their customers' acceptances cannot do otherwise than pay off-hand, and as a matter of course, bills presented for payment which are duly accepted, and regular and complete upon the face of them. It would be out of the question for a banker to adopt the suggestion made by one of the learned judges in Robarts v. Tucker (4), and defer payment until satisfied by inquiry and investigation that all the endorsements on the bill are genuine. That is hardly a practical suggestion. A banker so very careful to avoid risk would soon have no risk to avoid. (d) In paying their customers' acceptances in the usual way, bankers incur a risk perfectly understood, and in practice disregarded. Bankers have no recourse against their customers if they pay on a genuine bill to a person appearing to be the holder, but claiming through or under a forged endorsement. The bill is not discharged; the acceptor remains liable; the banker has simply thrown his money away. That was the effect of the decision in Robarts v. Tucker (4). I do not think that that was a harsh decision. Nor do I see how the court could have come to any other conclusion, unless it had taken quite a different view of the customer's mandate and the banker's obligation. At any rate, the ground of the decision is now part of the statute law. The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, enacts, s. 24, that, subject to certain provisions, which for the present purpose are immaterial, a forged or unauthorised signature on a bill is wholly inoperative, and that no right to retain the bill or to give a discharge therefor, or to enforce payment thereof against any party thereto, can be acquired through or under that signature except in case of an estoppel. Nothing but legislation could have relieved bankers from the liability attaching to them in accordance with the law as declared in Robarts v. Tucker (4). The fact that no such legislation has ever been promoted, or, I believe, advocated, on behalf of bankers in the case of bills of exchange, though the law has been relaxed as regards cheques, seems to show that in the case of genuine bills the liability is of little or no practical importance. (e) The drawee of a bill is bound to know the drawer's signature. It is his fault if he writes his acceptance on a forged instrument. And it is his act of acceptance which sends the bill forward for payment to the banker. (f) In the case of a counterfeit bill, the payee's signature must be forged unless the person named as payee is an accomplice in the fraud. And, therefore, if there is no accomplice, assuming Robarts v. Tucker (4) to apply, an acceptance making the bill payable at a bank necessarily entails upon the banker the loss of the sum for which the bill purports to be drawn. The banker has no chance of escape. Relying on his customer's acceptance, he takes it for granted that the bill is genuine. Ignorant of any danger, beyond the possible risk of a theft having been committed and remaining still undiscovered, he pays the apparent holder as a matter of course.

It seems to me that, if these premises are well founded, the bank is entitled to be indemnified by Vagliano Brothers in respect of the money paid on the forged bills which Vagliano accepted and directed the bank to pay. If A. employs B. on his behalf to deal with articles of a certain description in a particular way, and then A., through inadvertence or otherwise, introduces among the articles with which B. is to deal a dangerous counterfeit, not distinguishable in appearance from its companions, I cannot doubt that A. is bound to indemnify B. against any loss resulting from his dealing with the counterfeit as if it was a genuine article within the scope of his employment. And it cannot, I think, make any difference that B. is bound by the terms of his employment to bear every risk incident to his dealing with the genuine article.

There is, I think, a wide distinction between this case and Robarts v. Tucker (4), though in both it was the duty of the bankers to pay bills of exchange accepted by their customers to the person who, according to the law merchant, was capable of giving a good discharge, and in both the bankers were cheated out of their money. In the one case the customer's acceptance introduced to the bank a genuine mercantile instrument, though it had been tampered with by a thief without the fault or knowledge of the customer. In the other, the acceptance introduced a

A fraudulent counterfeit which the customer ought to have detected. In Roberts v. Tucker (4) there was presented for payment a genuine bill having a forged endorsement. The bankers paid the wrong man, leaving the bill unpaid and the liability of the customer undischarged. They claimed credit all the same. But they did not pretend that they had done what they were told to do; nor could they allege that their employer had any hand in misleading them. Of course their claim was rejected. In the present case the bankers have not failed in the performance of any duty towards their customer. They undertook no duty, they accepted no mandate, in regard to pieces of paper which are not bills of exchange, and with which the law merchant has no concern. They, too, have been cheated out of their money. Whether they can say that they have done what they were told to do remains to be considered. At least, they can say that their employers were active, though no doubt unconscious, in carrying out the deception which led to their loss.

I now come to the second question, which depends upon the effect of s. 7 (3) of the Act of 1882. The enactment was, of course, not directed to such a case as this. The provisions of the statute were meant for genuine bills of exchange. But if the argument on behalf of the bank is right, it happens to furnish a short answer to a claim which fails on broader and, I think, more satisfactory grounds. On behalf of the bank it was pointed out that these pretended bills being duly accepted and regular and complete on the face of them, were presented for payment apparently in due course; and it was said that, although no doubt at the time they were taken to be payable to order, and to be duly endorsed by the payee, yet when it turns out that the payee was a fictitious person, they may be treated as payable to bearer, and so the payment is justified though all the endorsements are inoperative. On behalf of Vagliano Brothers it was contended that a bill payable to a fictitious person is not payable to bearer unless the acceptor is proved to have been aware of the fiction; and further it was contended that nothing but a creature of the imagination can properly be described as a fictitious person.

I do not think that either of these contentions on behalf of the respondents can be maintained. Before the Act of 1882, the law seems to have been as laid down by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Bennett v. Farnell (7) (1 Camp. at p. 180 c.) that

“a bill of exchange made payable to a fictitious person or his order, is neither in effect payable to the order of the drawer nor to bearer, unless it can be shown that the circumstance of the payee being a fictitious person was known to the acceptor.”

Section 7 (3) of the Act of 1882 enacts:

“When the payee is a fictitious or non-existing person the bill may be treated as payable to bearer.”

As a statement of law before the Act, that would have been incomplete and inaccurate. The omission of the qualification required to make it complete and accurate as the law then stood, seems to show that the object of the enactment was to do away with that qualification altogether. The section appears to me to have effected a change in the law in the direction of the more complete negotiability of bills of exchange—a change in accordance, I think, with the tendency of modern views, and one in favour of holders in due course, and not, so far as I can see, likely to tend to any hardship or injustice.

Then it was said that the proper meaning of “fictitious” is “imaginary.” I do not think so. I think the proper meaning of the word is “feigned,” or “counterfeit.” It seems to me that the “C. Petridi & Co.,” named as payees on these pretended bills, were, strictly speaking, fictitious persons. When the bills came before Vagliano for acceptance, they were fictitious from beginning to end. The drawer was fictitious; the payee was fictitious; the person indicated as agent for presentation was fictitious. One and all, they were feigned or counterfeit persons put forward as real persons, each in a several and distinct capacity, whereas, in truth, they were each make-believes for the persons whose names appeared on the instruments. They were not, I think, the less fictitious because there were in existence real persons for whom the names were intended to pass muster. In the result, therefore, I think that on both grounds the bank is entitled to succeed. Nor is that conclusion altogether to be regretted. An opposite conclusion would, I think, go a long way to encourage mischievous negligence on the part of persons called upon to accept bills of exchange. To an acceptor it would be a matter of indifference whether the drawer's signature were genuine or not. If it was genuine, the transaction would be completed in regular course. If it were not genuine, the loss would fall, not on the acceptor whose negligence had led to it, but on the banker who could have no means of detecting the forgery, and must have been thrown off his guard by the carelessness of his employers.

LORD MORRIS.—I entirely agree in the conclusion arrived at by LORD HERSCHELL, namely, that whenever the name inserted as that of the payee is inserted without any intention that payment shall only be made in conformity therewith, the payee becomes a fictitious person within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 7 (3), and that the bill may be treated by a legal holder as payable to bearer; and having had the advantage of reading the noble and learned Lord's opinion in print, I concur in the reasoning by which that conclusion is arrived at. That conclusion appears to me not only to embrace the bills the subject of this litigation, but I am of opinion that they are a fortiori, and necessarily, within the statute as bills payable to bearer. The bills were regular in form, with Vucina of Odessa as drawer; Petridi of Constantinople named as payee, and Vagliano as drawee. Vagliano accepts the bills; that acceptance is the only real action of the three parties named in the bills. Vucina drew none of the bills, and knew nothing whatever about them; Petridi had no knowledge of, or any connection of any kind with them; Vucina, though a known existing person, had no reality in regard to them.

The paper writings only became bills as against Vagliano, who by his acceptance is estopped, in the language used in the statute is "precluded" [see s. 54 (2)], from denying they were bills as against the bank who paid them on the faith of his acceptance, and also upon his express requisition to do so. If Vucina was an unreal person, Petridi must be also an unreal person, and, therefore, a fictitious person in regard to the bills. The drawer can only designate the payee; but there was in fact no drawer. Vucina, the alleged drawer, could not and did not name any payee. Glyka, the forger, who wrote the documents in the form of bills of exchange, was not a drawer; he forges the name of Vucina as drawer; that cannot constitute Glyka himself a drawer. Vucina cannot become the alter ego of Glyka because Glyka forged his name; nor can Glyka be the alter ego of Vucina, who never knew of or heard of Glyka's existence, the only person who could call into existence a payee had no legal existence. There never was, in fact, a real bill of exchange, though the acceptor, Vagliano, is bound to know the drawer, and guarantee his existence and handwriting, and is precluded from denying against the holder that it is a bill of exchange. Only to the extent of the estoppel is the document a bill of exchange. In the case of a real drawer, that the payee is a fictitious person (unless it is obvious on the face of the bill) must be proved by the holder; but in the case of an unreal drawer, as a fact, the unreality and, therefore, fictitiousness, of the person named as payee follows necessarily. I am of opinion the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

LORD FIELD stated the facts and continued: The appellants first contended that the payees named in the drafts were "fictitious persons" within the meaning of s. 7 (3), of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and that the bills were, therefore, according to their tenor and effect in law bills payable to bearer, so that, whatever might have been the original limits of the authority under which the appellants had acted in undertaking the making of the payments complained of, it was

A competent to them, now that the actual facts had been discovered, to show and rely upon them as justifying their right to debit the respondent with the amount. I will deal with that contention first. That the terms of the original mandate, as between the appellants and respondent, were limited to payment to the actual endorsees of the payees named in the instruments is, I think, clear, and was not, if I followed the argument of the appellants correctly, seriously disputed. At the times of acceptance and payment, neither party entertained any suspicion that C. Petridi & Co. were other than what they appeared to be, genuine payees, and Vucina a genuine drawer. The respondent, therefore, had the right to assume that by making the payment to the order of the payees he would acquire a discharge to that amount in his accounts with the assumed drawer Vucina. On the other hand, it appears from the evidence that the bank, on presentation of the acceptances, did no more than refer to the advices and endorsements in order to satisfy themselves that the bills were in order. In other words by accepting the duty of paying the acceptances at maturity, they intentionally undertook the risk which the law merchant has been held, under those circumstances, to impose upon bankers in the case of a genuine acceptance (Roberts v. Tucker (4))—a liability the existence of which I understood the appellants did not deny; but they endeavoured to distinguish that case from the present by a circumstance which did not exist in that case—namely, that the respondent in this case had by the letters of advice untrue, although innocently, represented the drawing as genuine, whereas, it being a forgery, the respondents in paying the amount would acquire no valid discharge against any valid drawer. Assuming, however, that the letters of advice amount to such a representation, it does not appear to me that the appellants, in making the payments complained of, relied in any way upon it, nor that the representation goes any further than the acceptance itself, which in Roberts v. Tucker (4) was held insufficient to vary the duty of the banker.

The sole question in this case appears to me to be whether, in making the payments to Glyka, the bankers have complied with the direction of their customer. That direction is found in the letter of advice and the acceptance, and I do not see that the terms of the latter differ from the former. The question, therefore, upon this point seems to me to be reduced to this—whether, as alleged by the appellants, the payees were “non-existing or fictitious persons” within s. 7 (3), and, if so, whether as against an acceptor, no party to and ignorant of the fiction, the bills might be treated as payable to bearer so as to justify the payments to Glyka. Upon this point the appellants argued that, as in fact there was no person in existence capable of giving the discharge contemplated by the acceptor, or of making a valid title by endorsement, they were under no obligation to make any inquiries as to the named payees’ endorsement or require it, but were justified, as against the respondent, in making payment to the bearer; that being in law the tenor and effect of the bill.

In support of this proposition they cited various cases decided in the courts of common law for the purpose of showing that where the names, in one case even of known and existing persons, had been inserted as payees fictitiously, and without any intent that they should be actual payees, the courts had treated the bills as payable to bearer. Those cases have been fully discussed and dealt with in the courts below, and it will, I think, appear that in all of them the persons against whom the bills were so treated had been parties to the putting forth of the bills either with knowledge of the fictitious insertion, or with authority to make the instrument (as when accepted in blank) a negotiable instrument for the payment of money to somebody, which a holder in due course must of necessity have the right to enforce against somebody, so that the parties to their emission could not be heard to say that the bills were not payable at all for want of an endorsement by a payee who was never intended to have the power to and could not make any valid endorsement. The case nearest to the present in its facts is Cooper v. Meyer (6). There the persons named as payees were known and existing persons, although their names were fictitiously inserted by the drawer as payees without any intention that they should have anything to do with the bills. But the point decided in that case simply was that, the acceptor for whom the holder had discounted the bill having accepted for the accommodation of the drawer who had been guilty of this fiction, evidence that the handwriting of the endorsement was the same as that of the drawing, was sufficient as against the acceptor, who was precluded from denying the drawing, and, it was said, had given credit to the drawer's handwriting.

Upon the authority of these cases, and what was said to be the true construction of the statute, it was contended that the fraudulent intention of Glyka in inserting C. Petridi & Co. as payees, although unknown to the acceptor, had, as against him, converted an acceptance which was in terms payable to a named payee, "or order," into a liability to pay any bearer. But I fail to see how upon principle the intention of a drawer can alter the terms of a bill in which there is a named and ascertainable payee. All it can do is, where more than one person fulfils the description of the payee in the bill, to say which was the person intended (Mead v. Young (9))—and I, therefore, have come to the conclusion, which has been arrived at by LORD BRAMWELL, that the payees in the present case were not "fictitious or non-existent persons," within the meaning of the statute, so as to entitle the appellants to treat the respondent's acceptances as payable to Glyka, or any other bearer. It was not denied that the firm of C. Petridi & Co., who were so named as payees, were existing persons carrying on business at Constantinople, that they were known to be such to Vucina and others, and that the respondent had been in commercial relations with them by paying bills to their genuine endorsements. They are, however, said to be fictitious persons because Glyka intended so to deal with the bills that the fact that their names appeared upon them should remain concealed. What he intended was to obtain the amount of the bills by fraudulently inserting a genuine name as the payee, relying upon his being able in his position in the respondent's counting-house to prevent the discovery of the forgery. But I cannot see how that can render actual existing persons fictitious, within the meaning of the statute. If he had made Rothschild, of Vienna, or Hirsch, of Constantinople, payees, that would have been as fraudulent, but would not have made them fictitious persons. In this view it is unnecessary to consider whether, if the payees had been fictitious persons, within the meaning of the statute, the bill might be treated as against the respondent, who was ignorant of the fiction, as payable to bearer.

But the appellants argued, secondly, that, even if the payments in question could not be justified in themselves, the conduct of the respondent precluded him from complaining of them. They urged that his representation in the letter of advice that the bills were genuine commercial instruments, his instructions to honour them at maturity, coupled with such a lax system of business as enabled a man in the position of Glyka to concoct and carry into effect his extensive frauds; the omission to examine the forged endorsements on the bills when periodically returned by the appellants; the non-observance of the omissions in the forged letters, which ought to have been noticed and so excited inquiry, and the amount of the forged acceptances—£6,000 in June, £19,000 in July, and over £15,000 and £16,000 in August and September—which ought also to have excited attention, amounted to conduct without which the loss would not have happened, and so far conducted to the loss as to render the alleged rule applicable, that where a loss has to fall upon one of two innocent parties, it ought to be held to fall upon the party conducing to it. The appellant's case in this respect is, I think, a strong one, and deserving of great consideration, and, as I look upon their position as one of considerable hardship (for in any view of the case the forgeries by which they were deceived had been concocted and carried out by the respondent's servant, and, as I think, without such care and supervision on the respondent's part as I should like to have seen), I should have been well satisfied if, consistently with what I consider to be the law, I could have held in their favour.

A No doubt in one case (Lickbarrow v. Mason (10)), ASHHURST, J., stated, as a broad general principle, that whenever one of two innocent parties must suffer by the act of a third person, he who has enabled such person to occasion the loss must sustain it. But more recent decisions, and one of this House of great importance—Bank of Ireland (Governor & Co.) v. Evans's Charities Trustees (2)—have either shown that this proposition is not to be understood in all its generality, or cannot be supported; and this was very clearly pointed out in two cases which were not, I think, cited in argument: Arnold v. Cheque Bank, Arnold v. City Bank (11)—by the judges constituting the Common Pleas Division, who, in a very careful judgment, reviewed all the authorities. It was an action by the drawer to recover the proceeds of a bill which had been received by the defendants upon a forged endorsement, and negligence affording facilities for the fraud was set up, and evidence in support of it tendered at the trial, but rejected by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J. There were several acts of alleged negligence relied upon, some of them of a similar character to some of those relied upon in the present case.

In delivering the considered judgment of the court, consisting of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., LINDLEY, J., and ARCHIBALD, J., the Chief Justice said, on the second and third points (1 C.P.D. at pp. 586, 587):

D “It was contended by the defendants that there was evidence of negligence in the custody and transmission of the draft by the plaintiffs, which afforded facilities for the forgery and fraud, by which the defendants were induced to receive it, and that the evidence which was rejected would have shown an almost invariable custom for merchants in America, remitting bills to correspondents in England, to send another independent letter of advice, either by the same or a subsequent mail, and that there were opportunities of sending such a letter by other vessels leaving on the same day as the Celtic, or on subsequent days, which would have arrived in time to have enabled Messrs. Williams & Co. [the endorsees, whose endorsement had been forged], in the event of their not having received the draft in due course, to have communicated with Smith, Payne, and Smith, either by letter or telegram, to have stopped payment. We are of opinion, however, that there was no evidence of negligence which could operate by way of estoppel to the plaintiffs. . . . Reliance was placed on the defendants on the case of Young v. Grote (8). That case, no doubt, must be considered as well decided, but various opinions have been expressed as to the real ground of the decision. . . . But we have only to look at the case itself to see that it really proceeded on the authority of the extract from POTHIER, cited in the judgment of BEST, C.J., which makes the inability to recover depend upon the fault of the drawer of the cheque in the mode of drawing it, and is entirely consistent with the rule laid down and explained on fuller consideration in subsequent cases, viz., that negligence, in order to estop, must be negligence in the transaction itself: see per BLACKBURN, J., in Suan v. North British Australasian Co. (12). Indeed, in a later case, Bank of Ireland (Governor & Co.) v. Evans' Charities Trustees (2), this is stated by PARKE, B., himself to be the true ground of decision.”

Then the Chief Justice, after citing from the judgment of PARKE, B., proceeded (ibid.):

I “The rule, which is expressed by ASHHURST, J., in Lickbarrow v. Mason (10), ‘We may lay it down as a broad general principle that whenever one of two innocent parties suffers by the act of a third person, he who has enabled one person to occasion the loss must sustain it,’ was, though not expressly referred to, observed and acted on in Young v. Grote (8); and it has received illustration and explanation in subsequent cases on the subject, which show that the words ‘enabling a person to occasion the loss’ must be understood to mean, by some act, conduct, or default in the very transaction in question: see Freeman v. Cooke (13). The correct rule seems to us to be that which is thus stated by BLACKBURN, J., in his judgment in Swan v. North British Australasian Co. (12), where, referring to the judgment of WILDE, B., below, he says ‘that he omits to qualify the rule he had stated by saying that the neglect must be in the transaction itself, and be the proximate cause of leading the party into that mistake; and also must be the neglect of some duty that is owing to the person led into that belief, or, what comes to the same thing, to the general public of whom that person is one, and not merely neglect of what would be prudent in respect to the party himself, or even of some duty owing to third persons with whom those seeking to set up the estoppel are not privy. . . .’

In Bank of Ireland (Governor & Co.) v. Evans’ Charities Trustees (2), it was expressly held both that the negligence, in order to operate as an estoppel, must be negligence ‘in or immediately connected with the transfer itself,’ and, further, that it must be also the ‘proximate cause of the loss.’ ”

The principle thus enunciated seems to me to be sound, and, applying it to the present case, I am unable to say that the conclusions arrived at by the judge who tried the case, and by all the judges of the Court of Appeal, are wrong; and I am of opinion, therefore, that both grounds urged by the appellants fail, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed. Indeed, as has been observed by LORD BRAMWELL, in any view of this part of the case, I cannot see how this objection can avail in respect of the earlier bills, which up to May 14 amounted to £3,000, and up to June 27 to £6,000 more. Nothing is alleged to have been done or omitted, at all events at the first date, which would preclude the respondent from complaining of the prior payments. Taking the view which I do of this case, it is unnecessary for me to advert to the alleged negligence of the bank in continuing to pay such large sums in cash over the counter, and not through a bank, further than to say that there is nothing in the evidence which is very much in conflict relating to the matter, which, in my judgment, relieved the bank from their responsibility in respect of the payments complained of.

Contract—Offer to all the world—Conditional offer—Acceptance by performance of conditions—Waiver of notice of—Acceptance—Consideration—Offer made in advertisement.

A conditional offer made to all the world by, e.g., an advertisement, is capable of ripening into a contract between the offeror and any person who comes forward and performs the conditions. The performance of the conditions constitutes the acceptance of the offer. It is implied from the nature of the transaction that the offeror has dispensed with any notice of acceptance being given by the offeree before the offeree has performed the conditions and claimed performance of the contract by the offeror. The consideration for such a contract is, on the one side, the inconvenience which the offeree suffers in performing the conditions, and, on the other, the advantage which the offeror has through his offer being accepted.

The defendants, the proprietors of a medical preparation called the Carbolic Smoke Ball, published in a newspaper an advertisement in which they said they would pay £100 reward to any person who contracted influenza after having used one of the balls in a specified manner for a specified period. They also stated that they had deposited £1,000 with a bank to show their sincerity in the matter. The plaintiff, upon the faith of the advertisement, purchased one of the balls, and used it in the manner and for the period specified, but nevertheless contracted influenza. In an action by the plaintiff to recover the £100,

Held: the offer in the advertisement coupled with the performance by the plaintiff of the conditions specified therein created a valid contract, supported by consideration, on the part of the defendants to pay the £100 mentioned in the advertisement, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover the £100.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of HAWKINS, J.

On Nov. 13, 1891, the following advertisement was published by the defendants in the "Pall Mall Gazette": E

"£100 reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. to any person who contracts the increasing epidemic influenza, colds, or any diseases caused by taking cold, after having used the ball three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions supplied with each ball. £1,000 is deposited with the Alliance Bank, Regent Street, showing our sincerity in the matter. During the last epidemic of influenza many thousand Carbolic Smoke Balls were sold as preventives against this disease, and in no ascertained case was the disease contracted by those using the Carbolic Smoke Ball. One Carbolic Smoke Ball will last a family several months, making it the cheapest remedy in the world at the price—10s. post free. The ball can be refilled at a cost of 5s. Address: Carbolic Smoke Ball Co., 27, Princes Street, Hanover Square, London, W." F

The plaintiff, believing in the accuracy of the statements appearing in the advertisement with regard to the efficacy of the smoke ball in cases of influenza, or as a preventive of that disease, purchased one and used it three times every day, as directed by the instructions, for several weeks, from the middle of November, 1891, until Jan. 17, 1892, at which latter date she had an attack of influenza. Thereupon her husband wrote a letter for her to the defendants, stating what had occurred, and asking for the £100 promised by the defendants in the advertisement. The payment of that sum was refused by the defendants, and the present action was brought for its recovery. At the trial before HAWKINS, J., and a special jury the facts were not disputed, and the arguments of counsel on each side on the points of law involved in the case were heard by the learned judge on further consideration. It was denied on the part of the defendants that there was any contract between them and the plaintiff; and, alternatively, that, if there were any, it was void as a wagering contract. Further they alleged that the advertisement amounted to an offer to insure, and that there was no contract of insurance in conformity with the provisions of s. 2 of the Life Assurance Act, 1774. I

HAWKINS, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff and the defendants appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., and Thomas Terrell for the defendants.

Dickens, Q.C., and W. B. Allen for the plaintiff.

A LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal by the defendants against a decision of HAWKINS, J., rendering them liable to pay the plaintiff £100 under the circumstances to which I will allude presently. The defendants are interested in selling as largely as possible an article they call the "Carbolic smoke ball." What that is I do not know. But they have great faith in it as an effectual preventive against influenza and colds, or any diseases caused by taking cold, and as also useful in a great variety of other complaints. They are so confident in the merits of this thing that they say in one leaflet that the carbolic smoke ball never fails to cure all the diseases therein mentioned when used strictly according to these directions. Like other tradespeople they want to induce the public to have sufficient confidence in their preparation to buy it largely. That being the position they put this advertisement into various newspapers. It is printed in black-faced type, that is to say, the striking parts of it are. It is, therefore, put in a form to attract attention, and they mean that it should attract attention for the purposes to which I have already alluded. [His LORDSHIP read the advertisement.] The plaintiff is a lady who, upon the faith of one of these advertisements, went and bought at a chemist's in Oxford Street one of these smoke balls. She used it three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions supplied. But before she had done using it she was unfortunate enough to contract influenza, so that in her case this ball did not produce the desired effect. Whereupon she says to the Carbolic Smoke Ball Co.: "Pay me this reward of £100." "Oh no," they respond, "We will not pay you the £100." She then brings an action, and HAWKINS, J., has held that the defendants must pay her the £100. Then they appeal to us and say that that judgment is erroneous. The appeal has been argued with great ingenuity by the defendants' counsel, and his contentions are reduced in substance to this—that, put it as you will, this is not a binding promise.

I will pass, before I proceed further, to some of the various contentions which were raised for the purpose of disposing of them. I will afterwards return to the serious question which arises. First, it was said no action will lie upon this advertisement because it is a policy of insurance. You have, however, only got to look at it, I think, to dismiss that contention. Then it was said that this is a wager or bet. HAWKINS, J., examined that with his usual skill, and came to the conclusion that nobody ever thought of a bet, and that there is nothing whatever in common with a bet. I so entirely agree with him that I propose to pass that over as not worth serious attention.

Having got rid of the question of a policy, and having got rid of the question of a bet, let us see what we have left. The first observation I would make upon this is that we are not dealing with any inference of fact. We are dealing with an express promise to pay £100 in certain events. There can be no mistake about that at all. Read this how you will, and twist it about as you will, here is a distinct promise, expressed in language which is perfectly unmistakeable, that £100 reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. to any person who contracts influenza after having used the ball three times daily, and so on. One must look a little further and see if this is intended to be a promise at all; whether it is a mere puff—a sort of thing which means nothing. Is that the meaning of it? My answer to that question is "No," and I base my answer upon this passage: "£1,000 is deposited with the Alliance Bank, Regent Street, showing our sincerity in the matter." What is that money deposited for? What is that passage put in for, except to negative the suggestion that this is a mere puff, and means nothing at all? The deposit is called in aid by the advertisers as proof of their sincerity in the matter. What do they mean? It is to show their intention to pay the £100 in the events which they have specified. I do not know who drew the advertisement, but he has distinctly in words expressed that promise. It is as plain as words can make it.

Then it is said that it is a promise that is not binding. In the first place it is said that it is not made with anybody in particular. The offer is to anybody who performs the conditions named in the advertisement. Anybody who does perform the conditions accepts the offer. I take it that if you look at this advertisement in point of law, it is an offer to pay £100 to anybody who will perform these conditions, and the performance of these conditions is the acceptance of the offer. That rests upon a string of authorities, the earliest of which is that celebrated advertisement case of Williams v. Carwardine (1), which has been followed by a good many other cases concerning advertisements of rewards. But then it is said: "Supposing that the performance of the conditions is an acceptance of the offer, that acceptance ought to be notified." Unquestionably as a general proposition when an offer is made, you must have it not only accepted, but the acceptance notified. But is that so in cases of this kind? I apprehend that this is rather an exception to the rule, or, if not an exception, it is open to the observation that the notification of the acceptance need not precede the performance. This offer is a continuing offer. It was never revoked, and if notice of acceptance is required (which I doubt very much, for I rather think the true view is that which is as expressed and explained by LORD BLACKBURN in Brogden v. Metropolitan Rail. Co. (2)), the person who makes the offer receives the notice of acceptance contemporaneously with his notice of the performance of the conditions. Anyhow, if notice is wanted, he gets it before his offer is revoked, which is all you want in principle. But I doubt very much whether the true view is not, in a case of this kind, that the person who makes the offer shows by his language and from the nature of the transaction that he does not expect and does not require notice of the acceptance apart from notice of the performance.

We have, therefore, all the elements which are necessary to form a binding contract enforceable in point of law subject to two observations. First of all, it is said that this advertisement is so vague that you cannot construe it as a promise; that the vagueness of the language, to which I will allude presently, shows that a legal promise was never intended nor contemplated. No doubt the language is vague and uncertain in some respects, and particularly in that the £100 is to be paid to any person who contracts influenza after having used the ball three times daily, and so on. It is said, "When are they to be used?" According to the language of the advertisement no time is fixed, and, construing the offer most strongly against the person who has made it, one might infer that any time was meant. I doubt whether that was meant, and I doubt whether that would not be pushing too far the doctrine as to construing language most strongly against the person using it. I doubt whether business people, or reasonable people would understand that if you took a smoke ball and used it three times daily for the time specified—two weeks—you were to be guaranteed against influenza for the rest of your life. I do not think the advertisement means that, to do the defendants justice. I think it would be pushing their language a little too far. But if it does not mean that, what does it mean? It is for them to show what it does mean; and it strikes me that there are two reasonable constructions to be put on this advertisement, either of which will answer the purpose of the plaintiff. Possibly there are three.

It may mean that the promise of the reward is limited to persons catching the increasing influenza, or any colds, or diseases caused by taking colds, during the prevalence of the epidemic. That is one suggestion. That does not fascinate me, I confess. I prefer the other two. Another is, that you are warranted free from catching influenza, or cold, or other diseases caused by taking cold, while you are using this preparation. If that is the meaning, then the plaintiff was actually using the preparation when she got influenza. Another meaning—and the one which I rather think I should prefer myself—is becoming diseased within a reasonable time after having used the smoke ball. Then it is asked: "What is a reasonable time?" And one of my brothers suggested that that depended upon the reasonable view of the time taken by a germ in developing? I do not feel pressed by that. It strikes me that a reasonable time may be got at in a business sense, and in a sense to the satisfaction of a lawyer in this way. Find out what the preparation is. A chemist will tell you that. Find out from a skilled physician

A how long such a preparation could be reasonably expected to endure so as to protect a person from an epidemic or cold. In that way you will get a standard to be laid before a court by which it might exercise its judgment as to what a reasonable time would be. And it strikes me, I confess, that the true construction of this is that £100 will be paid to anybody who uses this smoke ball three times daily, for two weeks according to the printed directions, and who gets influenza, or

B a cold, or some other disease caused by taking cold, within a reasonable time after so using it. I think that that is the fair and proper business construction of it. If that is the true construction, it is enough for the plaintiff. Therefore, I say no more about the vagueness of the document.

I come now to the last point, which I think requires attention, i.e., the question of the consideration. Counsel for the defendants has argued with great skill that this is a nudum pactum—that there is no consideration. We must apply to that argument the usual legal tests. Let us see whether there is no advantage to the defendants. Counsel says it is no advantage to them how much the ball is used. What is an advantage to them and what benefits them is the sale, and he has put the ingenious case that a lot of these balls might be stolen, and that it would be no advantage to them if the thief or other people used them. The answer to that I

D think is this. It is quite obvious that, in the view of the defendants, the advertisers, a use of the smoke balls by the public, if they can get the public to have confidence enough to use them, will react and produce a sale which is directly beneficial to them, the defendants. Therefore it appears to me that out of this transaction emerges an advantage to them which is enough to constitute a consideration. But there is another view of it. What about the person who acts upon

E this and accepts the offer? Does not that person put himself to some inconvenience at the request of the defendants? Is it nothing to use this ball three times daily at the request of the defendants for two weeks according to the directions? Is that to go for nothing? It appears to me that that is a distinct inconvenience, if not a detriment, to any person who uses the smoke ball. When, therefore, you come to analyse this argument of want of consideration, it appears to me that there is ample

F consideration for the promise.

We were pressed upon this point with Gerhard v. Bates (3), which was the case of a promoter of companies who had promised the bearers of share-warrants that they should have dividends for so many years, and the promise as alleged was held not to show any consideration. LORD CAMPBELL's judgment upon that is, I take it, unintelligible; and when you come to examine it, I think it is open to the explanation which counsel for the plaintiff gave, that is to say, that the real point in that case was that the promise, if any, was to the original bearer and not to the plaintiff, and, as the plaintiff was not suing in the name of the original bearer, there was no contract with him. LORD CAMPBELL goes on to enforce that view by showing that there was no consideration shown for the promise to him. I cannot help thinking that LORD CAMPBELL's observations upon consideration would have been very

H different if the plaintiff in that action had been an original bearer, or if the court had gone on to show what a "societe anonyme" was, and that this promise was, and had been alleged to be, not only to the first bearer, but to anybody who should become the bearer. There was no such allegation, and the court said that, in the absence of such allegation, they did not know what a societe anonyme was—I mean, of course, judicially—and, therefore, there was no consideration. But here

I I cannot see the slightest difficulty, for the reasons I have given, in coming to the conclusion that there is consideration.

It appears to me, therefore, that these defendants must perform their promise, and if they have been so unguarded and so unwary as to expose themselves to a great many actions, so much the worse for them. For once in a way the advertiser has reckoned too much on the gullibility of the public. It appears to me that it would be very little short of a scandal if we said that no action would lie on such a promise as this, acted upon as it has been. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We were asked by counsel for the defendants to say that this document was a contract too vague to be enforced. The first observation that arises is that the document is not a contract at all. It is an offer made to the public. The terms of the offer, counsel says, are too vague to be treated as a definite offer, the acceptance of which would constitute a binding contract. He relies on his construction of the document, in accordance with which he says there is no limit of time fixed for catching influenza, and that it cannot seriously be meant to promise to pay money to a person who catches influenza at any time after the inhaling of the smoke ball. He says also that, if you look at this document you will find great vagueness in the limitation of the persons with whom the contract was intended to be made—that it does not follow that they do not include persons who may have used the smoke ball before the advertisement was issued, and that at all events, it is a contract with the world in general. He further says, that it is an unreasonable thing to suppose it to be a contract, because nobody in their senses would contract themselves out of the opportunity of checking the experiment which was going to be made at their own expense, and there is no such provision here made for the checking. He says that all that shows that this is rather in the nature of a puff or a proclamation than a promise or an offer intended to mature into a contract when accepted.

Counsel says that the terms are incapable of being consolidated into a contract. But he seems to think that the strength of the position he desires to adopt is rather that the vagueness of the document shows that no contract at all was intended. It seems to me that in order to arrive at this contract we must read it in its plain meaning as the public would understand it. It was intended to be issued to the public and to be read by the public. How would an ordinary person reading this document construe it upon the points which the defendant's counsel has brought to our attention? It was intended unquestionably to have some effect, and I think the effect which it was intended to have was that by means of the use of the carbolic smoke ball the sale of the carbolic smoke ball should be increased. It was designed to make people buy the ball. But it was also designed to make them use it, because the suggestions and allegations which it contains are directed immediately to the use of the smoke ball as distinct from the purchase of it. It did not follow that the smoke ball was to be purchased from the defendants directly or even from agents of theirs directly. The intention was that the circulation of the smoke ball should be promoted, and that the usage of it should be increased.

The advertisement begins by saying that a reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. to any person who contracts influenza, and the defendants say that "contracts" there does not apply only to persons who contract influenza after the publication of the advertisement, but that it might include persons who had contracted influenza before. I cannot so read it. It is written in colloquial and popular language. I think that the expression is equivalent to this, that £100 will be paid to any person who shall contract influenza after having used the carbolic smoke ball three times daily for two weeks. It seems to me that that would be the way in which the public would read it. A plain person who read this advertisement would read it in this plain way, that if anybody after the advertisement was published used three times daily for two weeks the carbolic smoke ball and then caught cold he would be entitled to the reward.

Counsel says: "Within what time is this protection to endure? Is it to go on for ever or what is to be the limit of time?" I confess that I think myself that there are two constructions of this document, each of them contains good sense, and each of them seems to me to satisfy the exigencies of the present action. It may mean that the protection is warranted to last during the epidemic. If so, it was during the epidemic that the plaintiff contracted the disease. I think more probably it means that it is to be a protection while it is in use. That seems to me the way in which an ordinary person would understand an ordinary advertisement about medicine and especially about a specific against influenza. It could not be supposed that after you had left off using it you would still be protected for

A ever as if there was a stamp set upon your forehead that you were never to catch influenza because you had used the carbolic smoke ball. I think it means during the use. It seems to me that the language of the advertisement lends itself to that construction. It says:

B "During the last epidemic of influenza many thousand Carbolic Smoke Balls were sold, and in no ascertained case was the disease contracted by those using the Carbolic Smoke Ball."

C The advertisement concludes with saying that one smoke ball will last a family several months—which means that it is to be continually used—and that the ball can be refilled at a cost of 5s. I, therefore, have no hesitation in saying that I think on the plain construction of this advertisement the protection was to enure during the time that the carbolic smoke ball was being used. LINDLEY, L.J., thinks that the contract would be sufficiently definite if you were to read it in the sense that the protection was to be warranted during a reasonable period after use. I have some difficulty myself on that point, but it is not necessary for me to develop it, because as I read the contract it covered the exact moment during which the disease here was contracted.

D Was the £100 reward intended to be paid? It not only says the reward will be paid, but it says: "We have lodged £1,000 to meet it." Therefore, it cannot be said that it was intended to be a mere puff. I think it was intended to be understood by the public as an offer which was to be acted upon, but counsel for the defendants says that there was no check on the persons who might claim to have used the ball and become entitled to the reward, and that it would be an insensate thing to promise £100 to a person who used the smoke ball unless you could check his using it. The answer to that seems to me to be that, if a person chooses to make these extravagant promises, he probably does so because it pays him to make them, and if he has made them the extravagance of the promises is no reason in law why he should not be bound by them.

F It is said it is made to all the world, i.e., to anybody. It is not a contract made with all the world. There is the fallacy of that argument. It is an offer made to all the world, and why should not an offer be made to all the world which is to ripen into a contract with anybody who comes forward and performs the conditions? It is an offer to become liable to anyone, who before it is retracted performs the conditions. Although the offer is made to all the world the contract is made with that limited portion of the public who come forward and perform the conditions on the faith of the advertisement. This case is not like those cases in which you offer to negotiate, or you issue an advertisement that you have got a stock of books to sell or houses to let, in which case there is no offer to be bound by any contract. Such advertisements are offers to negotiate, offers to receive offers, offers "to chaffer," as a learned judge in one of the cases has said: per G WILLES, J., in Spencer v. Harding (4). If this is an offer to be bound on a condition, then there is a contract the moment the acceptor fulfils the condition. That seems to me to be sense, and it is also the ground on which all these advertisement cases have been decided during the century. It cannot be put better than in H WILLES, J.'s judgment in Spencer v. Harding (4), where he says (L.R. 5 C.P. at p. 563):

I "There never was any doubt that the advertisement amounted to a promise to pay the money to the person who first gave information. The difficulty suggested was that it was a contract with all the world. But that, of course, was soon overruled. It was an offer to become liable to any person who, before the offer should be retracted, should be the person to fulfil the contract of which the advertisement was an offer or tender. That is not the sort of difficulty which presents itself here. If the circular had gone on 'and we undertake to sell to the highest bidder,' the reward cases would have applied, and there would have been a good contract in respect of the persons."

As soon as the highest bidder presents himself—says WILLES, J., in effect—the person who was to hold the vinculum juris on the other side of the contract was ascertained, and it became settled. A

Then it was said that there was no notification of the acceptance of the offer. One cannot doubt that as an ordinary rule of law an acceptance of an offer made ought to be notified to the person who makes the offer, in order that the two minds may come together. Unless you do that, the two minds may be apart, and there is not that consensus which is necessary according to the English law to constitute a contract. But the mode of notifying acceptance is for the benefit of the person who makes the offer as well as for the opposite party, and so the person who makes the offer may dispense with notice to himself if he thinks it desirable to do so. I suppose there can be no doubt that where a person in an offer made by him to another person expressly or impliedly intimates that a particular mode of acceptance is sufficient to make the bargain binding, it is only necessary for the person to whom the offer is made to follow the indicated method of acceptance. And if the person making the offer expressly or impliedly intimates in his offer that it will be sufficient to act on the proposal without communicating acceptance of it to himself, and the offer is one which in its character dispenses with notification of the acceptance, then according to the intimation of the very person proposing the contract, performance of the condition is a sufficient acceptance without notification. That seems to me to be the principle which lies at the bottom of the acceptance cases, of which an instance is the well-known judgment of MELLISH, L.J., in Harris v. Nickerson (5) and LORD BLACKBURN's opinion in the House of Lords in Brogden v. Metropolitan Rail. Co. (2) (2 App. Cas. at p. 691). It seems to me that that is exactly the line which he takes. B

If that is the law, how are you to find out whether the person who makes the offer does intimate that notification of acceptance will not be necessary in order to constitute a binding bargain? In many cases you look to the offer itself. In many cases you extract the answer from the character of the business which is being done. And in the advertisement cases it seems to me to follow as an inference to be drawn from the transaction itself that a person is not to notify his acceptance of the offer before he performs the conditions, but that, if he performs the conditions at once, notification is dispensed with. It seems to me, also, that no other view could be taken from the point of view of common sense. If I advertise to the world that my dog is lost and that anybody who brings him to a particular place will be paid some money, are all the police or other persons whose business is to find lost dogs to be expected to sit down and write me a note saying that they have accepted my proposal? Of course they look for the dog, and as soon as they find the dog, they have performed the condition. The very essence of the transaction is that the dog should be found. It is not necessary under such circumstances, it seems to me, that in order to make the contract binding, there should be any notification of acceptance. It follows from the nature of the thing that the performance of the condition is sufficient acceptance without the notification of it. A person who makes an offer in an advertisement of that kind makes an offer which must be read by the light of that common sense reflection. In his offer he impliedly indicates that he does not require notification of the acceptance of the offer. C

Then counsel for the defendants pressed on us very much in a most admirable argument, as it struck me, that this was a nudum pactum, that there was no consideration for this promise. He said that there was no consideration—that taking the influenza was a condition, and using the smoke ball was a condition, and that there was no consideration at all. In fact, he said that there was no request to use, express or implied. I will not elaborate the discussion upon the exact law as to requests in this kind of contract. I will simply refer to Victors v. Davies (6). There is also the note in MANNING AND GRANGER, which everybody ought to read who wishes to embark in this controversy—a note by SERJEANT MANNING in 1 Man. & G. at p. 265. The short answer, to abstain from academical discussion, is, it seems to me, that in the present case there is a request to use D

A involved in the very offer and the acceptance. What is the definition of consideration? The definition of consideration was given in SELWYN'S NISI PRIUS, which is cited by TINDAL, C.J., in Laythorp v. Bryant (7) (3 Scott at p. 250). It is any act of the plaintiff from which the defendant derives a benefit or advantage, or any labour, detriment or inconvenience sustained by the plaintiff, provided such act is performed or such inconvenience is suffered by the plaintiff with the consent, B either express or implied, of the defendant. Can it be said here that if the person who reads this advertisement applies thrice daily, or such time as may seem to him to be bearable, the carbolic smoke ball to his nostrils for a whole fortnight, he is doing nothing at all—that it is a mere act which is not to count towards consideration to support a promise? The law does not require us to measure the adequacy of the consideration. Sufficient if there is an inconvenience sustained C by the one party with the consent of the other. That is enough to support a consideration, as A. L. SMITH, L.J., pressed upon counsel from time to time during the argument here. It is enough to my mind that the plaintiff used the smoke ball. That is enough consideration. But the other view is, I think, that she used it, and that her using it was intended to be, and contemplated by the promissors as being indirectly a benefit to themselves, because the use of the smoke ball would D promote the sale of the smoke ball.

We were pressed with Gerhard v. Bates (3). As to that I have only to repeat what LINDLEY, L.J., has said. In Gerhard v. Bates (3), which arose upon demurrer, the point upon which the action turned was that they did not allege that the promise was made to the class of which alone the plaintiff was one, and, therefore, there was no privity between the plaintiff and the defendant. LORD CAMPBELL E went on to give a second reason. If his first reason was not enough, and the plaintiff and the defendant there had come together as contracting parties and the only question was consideration, it seems to me LORD CAMPBELL's reasoning would not have been sound. It is only to be supported if you read it as emphasising that the parties had not come into the relation of contracting parties. But if so the language was superfluous. The truth is that if you had found a contract F between the parties, there would have been no difficulty about consideration. But you could not find such a contract. In the same way in the present case, if you once make up your mind that there was a promise made to the plaintiff, as one of the public—a promise that, if she used the smoke ball three times daily for a fortnight, and contracted influenza, she should have the reward—it seems to me that her using the smoke ball was sufficient consideration. I cannot picture to G myself a view of the law on which the opposite could be entertained, when you have once found the contracting parties. If I say to a person: "If you use such and such a medicine for a week I will give you £5," and he uses it there is ample consideration for the promise.

In the present case the promise was put forward, I think, with the intention that it should be acted upon, and it was acted upon. It seems to me that there was H ample consideration for the promise, and that, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the reward.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The first point in this case is whether the defendants' advertisement which appeared in the "Pall Mall Gazette" was an offer which, when I accepted and its conditions performed, constituted a promise to pay, assuming that there was good consideration to uphold that promise; or whether it was only a puff from which no promise could be implied. In other words, as it has been stated to us, whether it was a mere statement by the defendants of the confidence they entertained in the efficacy of their remedy. That is the first matter to be determined. Or I might put it in other words, to use the words of LORD CAMPBELL in Denton v. Great Northern Rail. Co. (8), whether this advertisement was to be mere waste paper. That is how that learned judge summarised the arguments put forward in regard to the advertisement in that case. In my view, the true reading of this advertisement is this :

"£100 reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. to any person who, after having used the ball three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions supplied with such ball, contracts influenza, a cold, or any diseases caused by taking cold."

That, I think, is the true meaning of that advertisement, as I understand it. I think it means that if one of the public, as yet not ascertained, but as BOWEN, L.J., and LINDLEY, L.J., have pointed out, will be ascertained by the performing of the conditions, will hereafter use my smoke ball three times daily for two weeks according to my printed directions, I will pay him £100 if he contracts influenza within the period mentioned in the advertisement. Why is there not a request there? In consideration of your using my smoke balls at my request, and paying for them, which is a necessary part of the use, then if you catch influenza within a certain time I will pay you £100. It must not be lost sight of that this advertisement also states that, as security for what is being offered, and as proof of its security, £1,000 is actually lodged at the bank, wherewith to satisfy a possible demand which might be made in the event of the conditions contained therein being fulfilled, entitling a recipient to the £100 offered. How can it be said that such a statement as that embodied a mere expression of confidence in the wares which they had to sell? I cannot read the advertisement in any such way. In my judgment, the advertisement was an offer intended to be acted upon if the conditions were performed, and, when accepted, constituted a binding promise on which an action would lie assuming that there was consideration for that promise.

Counsel for the defendants stated that it was a promise in honour or an agreement in honour or a contract in honour. Asked what he meant by that, he said: "It is a nudum pactum." I understand that, if there is no consideration for a promise, it may be a promise in honour, or, as we should call it, a promise without consideration and nudum pactum. But if he means anything else I do not understand it. I do not understand what a bargain or a promise or an agreement "in honour" is unless it is one on which an action cannot be brought because it is nudum pactum. About nudum pactum I will say a word in a moment. In my judgment, therefore, this point fails. I think that this was an offer intended to be acted upon, and, when acted upon and the conditions performed, gave a right of action to a person performing these conditions.

In the next place, it is said that the promise is too wide, because it is said there is no limit of time within which the person is to catch influenza. I am not going to pause there. As has been pointed out by my brothers who preceded me, there are three possible constructions of this contract. I like the last two, if I may call them so, the best. I like the construction that it means catching influenza during the time you are using the ball, or catching influenza within a reasonable time after the expiration of the two weeks during which you have used it three times daily. It is not necessary to say which is the correct construction of this contract. The third construction is catching influenza during the epidemic. But, whichever is the true construction, there is sufficient limit of time so as not to make the contract too vague on that account. Then it was argued that, if the advertisement constituted an offer which might culminate in a contract if it was accepted, it was not accepted by the plaintiff in the manner contemplated. And it was said that the offer contemplated was such that notice of his acceptance had to be given by the party using the carbolic ball to the defendants before user, so that the defendants might be at liberty to superintend the experiment. All I can say is that there is no such clause in the advertisement, and, in my judgment, such a clause cannot be read into it. I only wish to say that I entirely agree with what has fallen from my brothers, namely, that this is one of those cases in which a performance of the conditions, the conditions being the use of these smoke balls for two weeks, three times a day, is an acceptance of the offer.

A It was then said that there was no person named in the advertisement with whom any contract was made. That, I suppose, has taken place in every case in which actions on advertisements have been maintained from the time of Williams v. Carwardine (1), and before that down to the present day. I have nothing to add to what has been said on that subject—that a person becomes a persona designata, and able to sue when he performs the conditions mentioned in the advertisement, which gives him a right to the reward therein offered. Then it was said that there was no consideration, and that it was nudum pactum. BOWEN and LINDLEY, L.JJ., have both pointed out the considerations. There are two considerations here. One is the consideration of the inconvenience of having to use the carbolic smoke ball for two weeks three times a day. That is a consideration moving from the plaintiff to the defendants. The other consideration is the money gain likely to accrue to the defendants by the enhanced sale of the smoke balls by reason of the plaintiff's user of them—ample consideration, it seems to me to support this promise. I have only now to add that, as regards the policy and the wagering points, in my judgment, there is nothing in either of them.

Discovery—Witness not party to action—Order against—Order made in Scottish action—Evidence on commission in England—Evidence by Commission Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict., c. 82), s. 5.

An action having been brought in Scotland for breach of warranty on the sale of a ship, a commission was issued, on the joint application of the pursuers and defenders, requiring the chairman and secretary of Lloyd's to appear before a commissioner in London and produce documents in their possession which came within general descriptions in specifications of documents given by the parties. The chairman and secretary having refused to attend before the commissioner, the parties to the action obtained an order from a judge in chambers under the Evidence by Commission Act, 1843, s. 5, ordering the chairman and secretary to appear before the commissioner for examination "as to the documents which Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping have in their possession answering the description mentioned in the specifications."

I

Held: the order was in effect an order that the persons to whom it was addressed should attend before the commission, not to give evidence and produce documents as ancillary to their examination as witnesses, but to make discovery of documents; there was no right to discovery as against a witness who was not a party to the action; and, therefore, the order had been made without jurisdiction and was bad.

Appeal from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and MATHEW, J.) affirming an order made by WRIGHT, J., in chambers.

The action was brought in Scotland for breach of a warranty of a ship called the Lady Octavia, sold by the defenders to the pursuers. At the request of both parties to the action, the Lord Ordinary granted a commission to examine certain witnesses, and granted diligence against the havers for recovery of the documents specified in the specifications of the pursuers and defenders, to certain commissioners to take the oaths and examinations of the havers resident in Germany, London, Glasgow, and Edinburgh respectively, and receive their exhibits and productions, and ordained E

"Mr. A. H. Tindall, chairman, and Mr. A. G. Dryhurst, secretary, of Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, to appear before the commissioner in London and produce any of the documents called for, so far as under their control." F

The specification of documents called for by the pursuers was:

"(1) All correspondence passing between the defenders or Barr, their surveyor, or any person on their behalf, on the one hand, and Emil Padderatz, surveyor at Hamburg to Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, or any one on his behalf, on the other, relating to the condition of the vessel known as the Lady Octavia, or the surveys of the said vessel in 1889, and in July and October, 1890, between Jan. 1, 1889, and the date of raising this action. G

(2) All correspondence between the said Emil Padderatz, on the one hand, and the London office of the said Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping or any of the officials of the said register relating to the said matters prior to the said date. (3) All reports obtained by, and all communications addressed to, the said Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping or any of the officials of the said register in reference to the said vessel during the years 1889 and 1890. (4) Failing principals, copies, drafts, scrolls, or jottings, of any of the above documents are called for." H

The specification of documents called for by the defenders was: I

"All correspondence passing between the pursuers or any one on their behalf, on the one hand, and Lloyd's, or Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, or W. H. Tindall, the chairman, and A. G. Dryhurst, the secretary, or any one on behalf of or as representing Lloyd's, or Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, on the other hand, relating to the vessel referred

A to on record as the Lady Octavia between May 1, 1890, and the date of raising the present action."

A copy of the interlocutor was duly served, and the commissioner cited Mr. Tindall and Mr. Dryhurst

B "to attend to produce the documents mentioned in the specifications served upon you, and give your oath and examination respecting the same on behalf of the pursuers."

Mr. Tindall and Mr. Dryhurst having refused to attend, a summons was taken out under the Evidence by Commission Act, 1848, s. 5, which provides:

C "And whereas there are at present no means of compelling the attendance of persons to be examined under any commission for the examination of witnesses issued by the courts of law and equity in England or Ireland, or by the courts of law in Scotland, to be executed in a part of the realm subject to different laws from that in which such commissions are issued, and great inconvenience may arise by reason thereof: Be it therefore enacted that if any person, after being served with a written notice to attend any commissioner or commissioners appointed to execute any such commission for the examination of witnesses as aforesaid (such notice being signed by the commissioner or commissioners, and specifying the time and place of attendance), shall refuse or fail to appear and be examined under such commission, such refusal or failure to appear shall be certified by such commissioner or commissioners, and it shall thereupon be competent to or on behalf of any party suing out such commission to apply to any of the superior courts of law in that part of the kingdom within which such commission is to be executed, or any one of the judges of such courts, for a rule or order to compel the person or persons so failing as aforesaid to appear before such commissioner or commissioners and to be examined under such commission; and it shall be lawful for the court, or a judge to whom such application shall be made, by rule or order to command the attendance and examination of any person to be named, or the production of any writings or documents to be mentioned in such rule or order."

F WRIGHT, J., made an order at chambers that Messrs. Tindall and Dryhurst should attend before the commissioner at such time and place as he might appoint,

G "for examination as to the documents which Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping have in their possession answering the description mentioned in the specifications [of the pursuers and defenders] of process in the said action, and also that they do respectively produce to the said commissioner the documents mentioned in the said specifications (without prejudice to the said W. H. Tindall and A. G. Dryhurst's objections before the commissioner as to all or any class of documents or document, or to further application by pursuers to a judge in any such case)."

H This order was affirmed on appeal to the Divisional Court (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and MATHEW, J.), and Mr. Tindall and Mr. Dryhurst appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.), Cohen, Q.C., and James Fox for the appellants.

Lyttelton for the defenders in the Scottish action.

I Gorell Barnes, Q.C., and Lyttelton for the pursuers in the Scottish action.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—An action has been brought in Scotland in respect of a contract for the sale of a ship by the defenders to the pursuers, on the terms that she was to be of a certain register at Lloyd's. It is said that Padderatz, Lloyd's surveyor at Hamburg, was to survey the ship and see if she would justify her register, and it was suggested that Padderatz was induced to concur in a fraud, or to perform his duty negligently, and the pursuers and defenders have by agreement obtained a consent order against the chairman and secretary of Lloyd's

Register that they should appear before a commissioner in London and produce any documents under their control answering to the descriptions in specifications given by the parties to the action. A

First, I find no evidence that there are any such documents in existence as are suggested to be by this order. If they are in existence, they relate to the business of third parties, and not to the rights existing between the pursuers and defenders. They are the correspondence between Lloyd's and Lloyd's agent, though it is true that this correspondence took place with reference to the ship which is the subject of the action in Scotland. The documents, if they exist, belong to Lloyd's and Lloyd's only. Sitting here, I am bound by a decision of the Court of Appeal, and the result of the decision in Elder v. Carter (1) is that the inquiry now is whether or not this order is one made really for inspection and discovery, or whether it is for the examination of witnesses in the course of proof for the purpose of establishing the facts. I do not know what facts are to be established. I do not know what documents are asked for. I do not know that the parties have any knowledge of any particular document or any knowledge that any document exists at all, and, therefore, it seems to me that it is inspection and discovery that they want and not proof, and between these two things a broad distinction is drawn in all cases. It will not do to attempt to evade the law by adding at the end of the order that the witnesses are to be examined in respect of the documents in their possession answering to the specification. The real meaning of the order, as I understand it, is that the witnesses are to be examined to ascertain whether they have such documents in their possession. The addition of those words at the end of the order add nothing to the substance of it. If the real object is discovery, the order will not be rendered valid by a limitation being inserted in it that it applies simply to documents relating to a certain vessel, and to documents made in certain years. C

I am of opinion that the order cannot stand; it was obtained by the agreement of the parties to the action against a third party, who is a stranger to the action. Such a person cannot be bound; to enforce such an order would be a gross abuse of private rights. On looking at the Act of Parliament it appears to me that the only process intended to be enforced is the production of documents as ancillary to the examination of witnesses. If there be any difference on this point between the law of England and Scotland, I can only say that, sitting here, I know of none. No evidence has been produced here that in Scotland such a roving commission would be allowed as this which is before us to-day. I do not believe that the power exists in the Scottish courts to enforce upon third parties the production of their documents simply to enable the parties to an action to ascertain whether the third parties have in their possession something which may be useful in the action. I do not believe it exists; but, sitting here, without any evidence being produced, I know nothing about it. E

The result seems to me to be that, looking at the order of the Scottish court, and the order made in England in furtherance of it, we must come to the conclusion that the latter is not justified by s. 5 of the Evidence by Commission Act, 1843, and R.S.C., Ord. 37, r. 7, as it is an order which is practically one for discovery, which would not be made under the circumstances of the case in this country. The appeal must be allowed. F

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case Messrs. Tindall and Dryhurst are appealing against an order made by WRIGHT, J., under the provisions of s. 5 of the Act of 1843, and the ground of their objection is that the judge had no jurisdiction to make the order. That is the question which we have now to determine. It raises nothing but the true construction of s. 5, and, therefore, I decline to consider any point in the law of Scotland. The order is entitled "in the matter of the Act" and "in the matter of an action pending in Scotland between Burchard and Others v. Macfarlane and Others," so that the order is made against two persons, Tindall and Dryhurst who have no relation to the action whatever. Their only connection with it is that possibly they may be called as witnesses. They object to the order G

A as being beyond the jurisdiction of the judge, because it is made on third parties who have nothing to do with the action, with respect to documents which are their sole property and not in any way the property of the parties to the action. They also say, that the order is beyond the jurisdiction of the judge, because it requires them not only to state whether there are in existence such documents as are wanted by the parties to the action, but also to produce them and allow them to be read before it has been determined whether these documents are or are not evidence in the action. What the meaning of this order is I confess I myself have no doubt. It is that Mr. Tindall, chairman, and Mr. Dryhurst, secretary, of Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, are to attend before a commissioner at such time and place as he may appoint "for examination as to the documents which Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping have in their possession" answering certain descriptions of a very large kind, "and also that they do respectively produce to the said commissioner the documents mentioned in the said specifications."

Reading the affidavits and the summons, and the order, I have no doubt that the effect of them is that the appellants are to produce their documents in order that the applicants may see and read them. The question is whether such an order is within this Act of Parliament. I am of opinion that it is beyond the jurisdiction of the judge to make the order. It is an order made on third parties for discovery, and it has been absolutely held in England that to make such an order is beyond the jurisdiction of a judge. I shall consider presently whether under this statute the law is not the same. Even supposing that the documents had been identified, and the witnesses were required to produce them for the purpose of being read, not at the trial, but before it, as a preliminary to the trial, I should have said that it would be beyond the jurisdiction of the judge to make such an order.

Let us see whether the same is true on the construction of this statute. In Chancery, before the Judicature Acts, no bill of discovery would have lain against a third person to discover documents in an action between other parties in which he had no interest. A subpoena duces tecum requiring a person to produce documents if he has any would be bad, as it would put on the witness the trouble of looking through what documents he had and coming to the conclusion as to what was relevant to the inquiry. What is a subpoena duces tecum? It is an order from the court requiring a person to produce to the court at the trial a document alleged to be in his possession. He is to produce it to the court, not to the parties; the parties have no right to see the document till it has been produced to the court, and even then subject to the order of the court. When the judge is satisfied that the document is evidence, then he may allow it to be read. Therefore, the suggestion must be that the Act of Parliament gives, as against third parties, a power which did not exist in any court as against them before the Act. The words relied upon in this Act are an order "for the production of any writings or documents to be mentioned in such rule or order." That is as like the words of Ord. 37, r. 7, as can be. That rule says:

"The court or judge may in any cause or matter at any stage of the proceedings order the attendance of any person for the purpose of producing any writings or other documents named in the order which the court or judge may think fit to be produced . . ."

I How has that rule been dealt with? It was held by the Court of Appeal in Elder v. Carter (1) that when you consider what was the purpose of the rule, although to read it according to the largeness of the words employed would enable the parties to the case to do that which they could not have done before either at law or in equity, that was not the meaning of the rule, and an order under the rule could not be made against a person who was not a party to the action. That judgment is binding on this court, and, in my opinion, it is clearly right.

Turning to s. 5 of the Act of 1843, which is an analogous enactment, the question is whether we are not compelled to hold the same. It seems to me that the statute applies to an order for the examination of a witness under a commission as though at the trial, the effect of the examination before the commissioner being the same as though it took place before the judge at the trial of the action. Where there is an order that a witness is to be examined before a commissioner, it is under the same circumstances as would arise if he were examined at the trial, and the order that may be lawfully made is for the attendance for examination as a witness as if he were at the trial, and the production of any writings or documents to be mentioned in the rule or order which may be made for his attendance and examination is only equivalent to saying that he must bring the writings or documents as he would bring them with him on a subpoena duces tecum. Here that is evaded. The order is for discovery before examination, instead of for production on examination. The moment it is admitted that he is a third person and is not in possession of the document as the agent of either party, it is clear that he is being asked to produce the document, not to the court for the purpose of the court exercising a discretion over it, or determining the legal right, but that it may be shown to the parties who, until the matter has been determined by a judge, have no right whatever to see it. It seems to me, therefore, that the case is outside the Act of Parliament, and the learned judge had no jurisdiction to make the order appealed against. The appeal must be allowed. A

FRY, L.J.—The circumstances of this case are fraught with suspicion, but I base my judgment not on that, but on the ground that, as it seems to me, such an order as this cannot be made under the Act of Parliament. The order is obviously one merely for the purpose of discovery. An examination as to documents means as to the possession of the documents, as to what documents are in the custody of the person examined, and as to the description of them. That seems to me to be the natural meaning of the order. On reference to the specifications, to which the order refers, my conclusion is strongly affirmed, because the documents are not clearly indicated there, but the witness is required to determine whether documents relate to the particular vessel, the intention apparently being that the society of Lloyd's Register shall go through all the documents in their custody or power that have passed between themselves and their agents to ascertain whether they have anything related to this vessel. The citation is to the same effect, and there is no evidence that Mr. Tindall or Mr. Dryhurst are persons who could give any evidence with regard to the facts in controversy between the parties in this action. Therefore, I have no doubt that the order really is that Mr. Tindall and Mr. Dryhurst are to come before a commissioner in order to make discovery of documents. It is analogous to a bill of discovery against a mere witness. E

Is such an order within the statute of 1843? In my judgment, it clearly is not. That statute enables the court in England, or Scotland, or Ireland, to direct a commission for the examination of witnesses—that is to say, persons who are able to bear testimony with regard to issues in controversy between the litigant parties. It does not mean that they may be examined with regard to the possession of documents which may be relevant to the controversy between the parties. That observation, in my opinion, applies to the whole of the section, and I think the words at the end, "for the production of any writings or documents to be mentioned in such rule or order," are only ancillary to the examination of witnesses. The words may enable the parties to require the production of the documents which the witness produces as a witness, but they cannot for one moment be stretched so as to enable anyone to obtain discovery against a witness. H
I

Counsel put forward a very ingenious argument. He said that the law of Scotland must govern the Scottish commission in England, and the law of England must govern the English commission in Scotland, and if the law of Scotland enables you to get discovery against a witness in Scotland, you must be able in England to obtain discovery from the witness. There are two answers to that. In the first place, I do not think that is the true meaning of the section, but, even if it were, there is no evidence before us that by Scottish law discovery can be

A obtained against a witness. If that were the Scottish law, it must be borne in mind that the English court must exercise a discretion. I say, without hesitation, that if I were judge at chambers I would never make an order which enabled a Scottish commission in England to obtain discovery from a mere witness. Therefore, I have no doubt that even if counsel was right in his contention, and the law of Scotland is that which, he suggests, an English court should not follow it in granting discovery against a mere witness.

B It is to be observed that by the law of England it is impossible to obtain discovery against a witness. In the old Court of Chancery you might maintain a bill for discovery, but it was necessary to show the interest of the plaintiff in the documents to be discovered, the interest of the defendant in the documents to be discovered, and the right of the plaintiff as against the defendant to the production of the documents that were discovered. Without that, the bill was demurrable. C It is obvious no such bill could ever lie against a witness. In the same manner with regard to a subpoena duces tecum. You could never call on a witness to ascertain whether documents related to the particular matter in controversy. In Lee v. Angas (2), a subpoena duces tecum was served upon a witness which described certain documents and then went on to direct him to produce all other D documents in his possession or power in any wise relating to certain matters in question. It was held that as a subpoena duces tecum it was bad, being in fact a bill of discovery against a witness. Then again, under R.S.C., Ord. 37, r. 7, the same observation applies. That rule is undoubtedly conceived in very wide language. It came before the Court of Appeal in Elder v. Carter (1), and the court took the view that, as there is no right to discovery against a witness, however E wide the language of the order may be, there was no power to get the relief sought for. It appears to me that if we were to give the slightest countenance to this proceeding we should be doing a great injustice. It has been said, and not without justice, that it is a remarkable thing that A., by making a series of false statements against B., and putting them on the back of a writ or calling them a statement of claim, may obtain inspection of the books of B. That is the law, but F it has never yet been carried to this extent that by making a statement against B., A. can obtain discovery of the books of C. This is an attempt to carry it to that extent, and, in my judgment, it ought to fail.

ALLCROFT AND OTHERS v. BISHOP OF LONDON

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lord Bramwell, Lord Herschell, Lord Field and Lord Hannen), April 30, May 1, 4, July 20, 1891]

[Reported [1891] A.C. 666; 61 L.J.Q.B. 62; 65 L.T. 92]

Ecclesiastical Law—Offence—Illegal church ornaments—Representation to bishop—Finality of decision—Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict., c. 85), s. 9.

By s. 9 of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, it is provided that, where a representation under s. 8 has been sent to the bishop of the diocese complaining of any unlawful alteration in, or addition to, the fabric, ornaments, or furniture of the cathedral church, he shall take certain steps and then hear and determine the matter "unless the bishop shall be of opinion, after considering the whole circumstances of the case, that proceedings should not be taken." In the latter case he is to state his reasons in writing.

Held: the discretion conferred on the bishop by s. 9 was a general one, and, if, after considering the whole circumstances of the case, including whether further proceedings would inflict mischief on the Church and the religious life of the country, he came to the conclusion that proceedings should not be taken, his decision was not subject to review by the courts.

Per LORD HERSCHELL: When the statute prescribes that the bishop's opinion is to be formed after considering the whole of the circumstances of the case, I think it must mean that the bishop is to consider all the circumstances which appear to him, honestly exercising his judgment, to bear on the particular case, and upon the question whether he ought in that case to prevent proceedings being taken. I dissent entirely from the view that it is for the courts or your Lordships to determine what are the considerations which ought to govern the bishop's opinion.

Per LORD HALSBURY, L.C.: A mandamus is an appropriate proceeding to remedy the failure of an authority properly to exercise a jurisdiction conferred on it by statute.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal, reported 24 Q.B.D. 213.

The appellants, inhabitants of the diocese of London, made a representation to the bishop, under the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, s. 8, that certain figures which had been placed in St. Paul's Cathedral tended to encourage ideas and devotions of an unauthorised and superstitious character, and that superstitious regard and reverence were likely to be and had been paid to them, contrary to the Twenty-second Article of Religion. They further asserted that the figures were unlawful according to the law of the Church of England. The bishop expressed the opinion that proceedings should not be taken on the representation. On July 13, 1888, the appellants applied to the Divisional Court of Queen's Bench, consisting of

- A LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and MANISTY, J., for a rule nisi for a mandamus to compel the bishop to proceed, which was granted. The rule came on for argument on June 1, 1889, before LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., MANISTY, J., and POLLOCK, B., when the court made the rule absolute for a mandamus, POLLOCK, B., dissenting. On appeal, the Court of Appeal, consisting of LORD ESHER, M.R., LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ., reversed the decision of the court below, and discharged the rule.
- B The appellants thereupon brought the present appeal to the House of Lords.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., Danckwerts, and Bovill for the appellants.

The Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.), Sir W. Phillimore and Coward, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

- C Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 20, 1891. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—Under the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, s. 8, certain persons therein described are made competent as complainants if in any cathedral or church alterations or additions to the fabric, ornaments, or furniture thereof have been made without lawful authority, or if any decoration forbidden by law has been introduced into such cathedral or church. The required number of persons competent under the section have in due form made a complaint in which it is stated :

- E “In or about the month of January, 1888, the dean and chapter of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul introduced into the said church, and set up upon the altar-piece or reredos therein, an image or sculptured subject representing Our Lord upon the Cross, in a conspicuous position immediately above the Communion-table, the figure of Our Lord being of the height of 5 ft. or thereabouts. This image is so constructed as to have the appearance of such an altar crucifix as was used in the Church of England immediately before the Reformation, and so as to answer the purposes for which such a crucifix was intended. At the same period the dean and chapter introduced and set up upon the said altar-piece or reredos an image or sculptured subject representing the Blessed Virgin Mary, with the Child Jesus in her arms, in a conspicuous position a few feet above the said image of Our Lord upon the Cross. The figure of the Virgin is of the height of 5 ft. or thereabouts.”

- G These representations were duly forwarded to the Bishop of London. The bishop, if he had thought proper, might have taken proceedings thereon as provided by the Act, but he has been of opinion that proceedings should not be taken, and the bishop is the only person who by law has jurisdiction to form an opinion on the subject. There is no right of appeal from his judgment. It is a jurisdiction confined by the legislature to the bishop himself, and there is no power by law to interfere with the judgment which the bishop may form on the subject. By s. 9 it is provided :

- I “Unless the bishop shall be of opinion, after considering the whole circumstances of the case, that proceedings should not be taken on the representation (in which case he shall state in writing the reason for his opinion) . . . he shall [certain steps having been taken] proceed to hear the matter of the representation . . . and shall pronounce such judgment . . . as he may think proper, and no appeal shall lie from such judgment . . .”

A peremptory writ of mandamus was obtained on June 1, 1888, directing the bishop to proceed in pursuance of the Act, notwithstanding that on May 23 the bishop had sent, in pursuance of the Act, a statement in writing of the reason for his opinion that proceedings should not be taken on the representation. That statement is as follows :

“We, Frederick, by Divine permission, Bishop of London, having, in pursuance of the provisions of the Public Worship Regulation Act, considered the whole circumstances attending the above representation, are of opinion that proceedings should not be taken for the following reason: The proposed proceedings have for their object the determination of the question whether a reredos, showing Our Lord on the Cross in a conspicuous position immediately above the Communion-table, and also the Blessed Virgin Mary with the Child in her arms in a conspicuous position a few feet above, has any tendency to idolatry, and whether its erection is permitted by law. The main question of principle here at issue has been already decided in the Exeter case (Phillpotts v. Boyd (1)). In that case the reredos showed a figure of Our Lord in the act of ascending to Heaven in a conspicuous position immediately above the Communion-table, and this reredos was held to be lawfully erected. The sole object of the proceedings now proposed is merely to determine whether there may be exceptions to the principle laid down in the Exeter case, and whether the reredos now erected in St. Paul's is such an exception. It appears to me impossible to say that the difference between the two erections is of very grave importance, or that one offers serious temptations to idolatry and the other does not. Litigation in these matters is sometimes necessary in order to settle disputed points of grave importance. But even in such cases litigation is a necessary evil. It keeps up irritation and party strife, it embitters men's feelings, it inflicts much mischief on the Church and on true religion, and it is only tolerable as a preventive of worse mischief that would otherwise follow. It is always possible after any great question of principle has been decided to keep up litigation indefinitely by raising minor points, and such litigation becomes more mischievous the longer it is continued, while the results obtained from it are of exceeding little value. I am satisfied that in the present instance the proceedings could not end in any result which would make up to the Church and to the religious life of the country for the mischief which must inevitably be inflicted on them by the litigation itself.—Dated this 23rd day of May, 1888, London House, S.W.—F. London."

I do not deny that, where some authority has been entrusted with a discretion which they decline to exercise a writ of mandamus is an appropriate writ to remedy such neglect of duty, though I very much doubt whether the particular form of peremptory mandamus here awarded could ever be justified under this Act of Parliament. But it is obvious that, to justify any writ of mandamus, it must be made to appear that the bishop has not exercised the jurisdiction which the statute has vested in him. Your Lordships have nothing to do with the question whether his judgment is right or wrong. Your Lordships would be exceeding your own jurisdiction if you were attempting to review a judgment, the jurisdiction to form which the legislature has confided to the bishop and to the bishop alone. I confess I cannot entertain a doubt that the legislature, when using the language, "after considering the whole circumstances of the case," intended to show that the bishop's jurisdiction was not confined to the mere question whether there had been an infraction of the law. They intended to widen and enlarge the considerations which might weigh on the bishop's mind in determining the question whether the proceedings should go on.

It is, perhaps, not unworthy of remark that LORD TENTERDEN, C.J., in R. v. Mills (2) uses the very phrase to distinguish a wide and general discretion from that which is confined within narrow limits. He said (2 B. & Ad. at p. 581):

"The justices of the county, into which the apprentice is to be bound, have a general discretion to consider the propriety of the binding. If they had only a particular discretion, and had not exercised it, the court would have compelled them to do so; but here they have a general discretion, after inquiring into all the circumstances of the case, to determine on the fitness of the binding, and, as they have exercised it, there is no ground for a mandamus."

It is, to my mind, obvious that if the only discretion intended to be vested in the bishop was, to use LORD TENTERDEN's language, "a particular discretion," that is

A to say, whether the complaint was frivolous or whether there had been really some infraction of the law, it would have been very easy to find appropriate language to give effect to such a provision; but the language of the legislature has, I think, been careful to show that the bishop's discretion is not so fettered, and that the inquiry into all the circumstances of the case is one which may justly include considerations of the good to be done or the mischief involved in proceedings which, B unless they obtain the bishop's sanction, cannot proceed.

The reason given by the bishop is said to show that he has not considered all the circumstances of the case. The statement in writing commences with the allegation that he has done so, and it is argued that this cannot be accurate because he states that he has been influenced in deciding the main question principally by Phillpotts v. Boyd (1). I am unable to follow the reasoning. The complaint is C made of an image or sculptured subject representing Our Lord upon the Cross. It has been in some cases argued that all such sculptured representations are unlawful. The bishop in effect says: "I have considered that question, and Phillpotts v. Boyd (1) has decided that all such sculptured representations are not necessarily unlawful." He says, in effect, further on: "I have considered the redos now erected in St. Paul's, with a view to see whether there is in it anything which D excepts it from the effect of the decision in Phillpotts v. Boyd (1);" and he says that it appears to him that the difference between the erections in Exeter and in St. Paul's is not such that it is possible to represent that the one offers serious temptation to idolatry and that the other does not. Rightly or wrongly, the bishop thinks that there is nothing of any importance in the redos in question to distinguish it from that which was held to be lawful. I only use that phrase "rightly or wrongly" E to emphasise the fact that I am not presuming to enter into the question of the accuracy of the bishop's judgment, over which, as I have said, I have no jurisdiction. The bishop then proceeds to show that the litigation would be mischievous if persisted in; that no important question could be determined by its continuance except one which is already covered by authority, and in his view litigation would be mischievous both to the Church and to the religious life of the F country. I am wholly unable to understand how, under such circumstances, it can be contended that the bishop has not considered all the circumstances of the case.

I may say that LORD HANNEN and LORD FIELD inform me that they entirely concur in the reasons which I have given for my opinion.

G LORD BRAMWELL.—I am of opinion that this decision should be affirmed. I cannot set any value on the words "whole circumstances of the case." I think the duty of the bishop would be the same without those words as with them. Of course, he is to consider the circumstances of the case—that is the whole, not a part only. Expressio eorum quæ tacite insunt nihil operatur. However, I will bear the words in mind. The bishop is to consider the circumstances of the case. H It was argued that he need not; that he might say: "I will not consider them," and then he must transmit the representation and proceed as in the statute. There is absolutely no pretence for this contention; he would fail in his duty if he did not consider the case. He is only to transmit the case if he considers he ought. Suppose the words, instead of those used, had been: "If the bishop shall be of opinion that proceedings should be taken, he shall transmit," etc., could there be I a doubt that he would have to consider the case? There is, indeed, this difference—that if, as the words stand, he cannot say that proceedings should not be taken, though he could not say affirmatively that they should be, he ought to transmit the representation. For he is not of opinion that he ought not. But that does not show he need not consider the case. He is bound, it is his duty to do so.

Then it was said that there was something he had considered which he ought not to have considered, and something he had not considered which he ought to have, and so he had not considered the whole circumstances and them only. It seems to me that this is equivalent to saying that his opinion can be reviewed. I am clearly of opinion it cannot be. If a man is to form an opinion, and his opinion is to govern, he must form it himself on such reasons and grounds as seem good to him. If, indeed, one can suppose the bishop, in such a case as this, refusing to form an opinion, whether by a point-blank refusal, or by such a statement as that he was of opinion proceedings should not be taken because they never should be, it may well be that he might be ordered to do his duty. That would be to consider the case as in the alternative branch of the rule nisi; not to transmit the representation as the rule commands him. How could he, in the case I have put, ask the parties whether they would submit to his directions [see s. 9 of Act of 1874]? I have dealt with this argument, but the question does not arise, for the bishop has considered the circumstances of the case. He has not declined jurisdiction.

Then it is said why, if his decision cannot be reviewed, is he to state his reasons? LINDLEY, L.J., has given an excellent answer to this. It is that he may be under the necessity of forming a careful opinion, and one that will bear public examination. It is like the constitutional duty of judges, who give their reasons for their judgment, though there is no appeal, as in the case of your Lordships, and as formerly the judges of the Superior Court gave on motions for new trials, for example, and other cases, and as they do now, though there was and is no appeal. I believe, if there had been such a law or rule in the Church Discipline Act, 1840, it would have been impossible that the question in Julius v. Lord Bishop of Oxford (3) would have arisen. It was asked, what was the use or object of the Act of 1874 if the bishop still has a discretion which cannot be reviewed? I have partly answered that argument already; but if anyone will refer to LORD PENZANCE's opinion in Julius v. Lord Bishop of Oxford (3) he will see what might be the application to the bishop, who might make it, and other matters not provided for by the Act of 1840, but provided for in the Act of 1874.

I have one more remark to make. LORD CAIRNS, L.C., said that where there was a discretion the opinion ought not to be criticised. LORD CAIRNS was a great lawyer and a consummate judge, but I differ from him unhesitatingly. I think that it is precisely where there is a discretion that the decision may be criticised. I thought, nay I knew, that the law was being broken, and that there was a refusal to try and stop the illegality. That was wrong, and I said so. It is not a duty in a judge to do that, but it is often done, and with the goodwill and approval of the public, and I would do so in this case if I thought the bishop wrong—that is, if I knew he was not interfering to stop, as in Julius v. Lord Bishop of Oxford (3), what he knew was illegal. But I do not; I have absolutely no opinion whether he was right or wrong; I do not understand the matter; it has not been argued before us. I carefully abstain from any indication of an opinion on what may be called the merits, as I think it beside the question before us. These considerations apply to both the cases.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The question which arises on each of these appeals is whether a mandamus ought to issue to the Bishop of London commanding him to transmit a copy of the representation of the appellants to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's Cathedral. In the case in which Allcroft and others are the appellants the writ was issued in accordance with the judgment of the majority of the judges who heard the case in the Queen's Bench Division, but the order for the issue of the writ was reversed by the Court of Appeal. The representation made to the bishop was that the dean and chapter had set up upon the reredos an image of Our Lord upon the Cross in a conspicuous position, and also an image of the Virgin Mary with the Child in her arms. It was further represented that each of the images tended to encourage ideas and devotions of an unauthorised and superstitious kind, and that they were additions to the fabric, ornaments, or furniture of the cathedral church, and were decorations forbidden by law. The bishop did not transmit the representation to the dean and chapter, but stated in writing the reasons for his opinion that proceedings should not be taken thereon.

A That it was within his province thus to act, under the provisions of the statute of 1874, could not be denied. The words of s. 9 of the enactment are clear and unambiguous :

B "Unless the bishop shall be of opinion, after considering the whole of the circumstances of the case, that proceedings should not be taken on the representation (in which case he shall state in writing the reason for his opinion) . . . he shall, within twenty-one days after receiving the representation, transmit a copy thereof to the person complained of."

C It is obviously, therefore, a complete answer to the allegation that the bishop has committed a breach of duty in not transmitting the representation to the persons complained of, that he was of opinion, after considering the whole of the circumstances of the case, that proceedings ought not to be taken thereon. But it is said that in the present case it appears, from the reasons he has given, that the bishop's opinion was not formed "after considering the whole circumstances of the case," and that the condition which would alone justify his abstaining from transmitting the representation has thus not been complied with. The appellants insist that if D the bishop considers less than the whole of the circumstances of the case or anything beyond those circumstances in forming his opinion, he is bound to transmit the representation and allow the proceedings to continue, even though he be, in fact, of opinion that proceedings ought not to be taken. And they say that, in the case before your Lordships, it is manifest that his opinion has been based upon considerations outside the circumstances of the case.

E When the statute prescribes that the bishop's opinion is to be formed after considering the whole of the circumstances of the case, I think it must mean that the bishop is to consider all the circumstances which appear to him, honestly exercising his judgment, to bear upon the particular case, and upon the question whether he ought in that case to prevent proceedings being taken. I dissent entirely from the view that it is for the courts or your Lordships to determine what are the considerations which ought to govern the bishop's opinion. If a dozen persons told F to consider all the circumstances of a given case, and to form their opinion thereon, were required to state what considerations they had taken into account, I do not believe that any two of them would precisely agree in their statement. Supposing a writ of mandamus were to issue in such a case as this, and that the bishop were to return that he was of opinion, after considering all the circumstances of the case, that proceedings should not be taken, the return would undoubtedly be good G in point of law. It could only be met by a traverse of fact; and a jury would have, I presume, to determine, if the contention of the appellants be well founded, what in their opinion were the circumstances which the bishop ought to have taken into consideration.

H I am satisfied that this could not have been intended by the legislature. It appears to me, I confess, clear that the bishop has been empowered, even where the presentation shows prima facie a breach of the law, to say whether under the circumstances the proceedings ought to be permitted. It was contended that inasmuch as the legislature requires the bishop to state the reasons for his opinion, it was intended that these reasons should be reviewed, to the extent at least of seeing that the bishop had considered all the circumstances of the case. I can draw no such conclusion. I think this obligation was imposed upon him in order I to secure, as I think it was calculated to do, a careful consideration of the circumstances of the case, and a conclusion for which, in the bishop's opinion, he was able to disclose adequate reasons. The knowledge that his reasons would be made public and be the subject of criticism, would manifestly tend to prevent capricious and ill-considered action.

Arguments were addressed to your Lordships with a view of showing the inconvenient and mischievous consequences which might flow from such a discretion if uncontrolled; but with this your Lordships have nothing to do; your duty is to administer the law according to its plain interpretation and not to modify it, even though you should think that by so doing a more just and expedient result would be insured. One can conceive cases, such as were suggested in argument, in which it might be shown that the bishop had not exercised his discretion at all; if, for example, he determined never to permit proceedings under the Act, or laid down some arbitrary rule by which his action was to be governed, independent of the circumstances of the particular representations he might receive, in such an event the courts might well interfere, just as they have done in similar circumstances in the case of justices who were empowered to exercise a discretion; but nothing of the sort was or could be suggested in the present case. It is impossible to read the bishop's statement without seeing that he has honestly considered what appeared to him to be all the circumstances bearing on the question whether proceedings should be allowed to go on.

This being so, it is not for your Lordships, on this application for a mandamus, to consider whether the bishop's reasons are good or bad; whether they ought or ought not to have led him to form the opinion he did. But I think it only right to say that the meaning of that part of his statement which refers to Phillpotts v. Boyd (1) has, in my opinion, been misconceived by the appellant. That case did, I think, decide that the introduction of a figure of Our Lord in a reredos as part of a decoration was not of itself necessarily and under all circumstances unlawful. And this is, I think, all that the bishop meant to say in the passage which was so much commented on at the Bar. I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below was right and ought to be affirmed.

In 1887 A., being requested by S., one of the promoters of a company formed to purchase real property acting in the interests of the vendor to the company, to become a director, agreed to do so upon an undertaking by S. that, if A. should desire at any time to part with the shares in the company which he would have to take to qualify him as a director, S. would purchase them from him at the same price which he should pay for them. The company was formed, fifty £10 preference shares were allotted to A. as qualification shares, he paid £500 for them, and from time to time acted as a director. In 1888 he resigned his seat on the board, and shortly afterwards S., at his request, although the shares of the company at that time were valueless, paid him £500 in repayment of the sum which he had originally paid for the shares, and accepted a transfer of them. The arrangement between S. and A. and the payment of the £500 by S. to A. were never disclosed to the board of the company. In the winding-up of the company, the liquidator took out a sum-

B Held: A., as a director, was an agent of the company and as such could not be allowed to make any profit from a transaction within the scope of his agency; in entering into the arrangement with S. and not disclosing it he had been guilty of misfeasance within s. 165; and, therefore, he would be ordered to pay to the company the £500 which he had received from S.

better stated than it was by MELLISH, L.J., in Hay's Case (1) (10 Ch. App. at p. 601):

"There is no doubt about the rule of this court that an agent cannot, without the knowledge and consent of his principal, be allowed to make any profit out of the matter of his agency beyond his proper remuneration as agent. It is perfectly settled law that that rule applies with peculiar stringency to the directors of joint stock companies, who are the agents of the company for effecting the sales or the purchases made by the company."

The lord justice goes on to say that the only question is whether Sir John Hay in that case came within that principle.

Counsel for Mr. Archer have argued that that principle is not applicable to this case, and they put it in this way very forcibly. They say that this is a new case, and I think it is as regards the details of it. They say that there was nothing got from the company by Mr. Murray Smith, and through Mr. Murray Smith to Mr. Archer. I do not know whether that was so or not. I am not going to speculate whether it was; but Mr. Murray Smith unquestionably was a promoter acting in the interests of the vendor. Whether Mr. Murray Smith got anything out of this company or not, I do not know. Was he one of those possibly benevolent promoters of whom one can speculate? I never met with one or heard of one, and I never knew a promoter of a company to buy land in a colony from motives of pure benevolence. But we will suppose he did, and we will suppose that Mr. Murray Smith got nothing directly or indirectly out of this company. Still, it cannot be right, considering the position of a promoter and the position of directors, for a promoter to put a director in the position in which Mr. Murray Smith put Mr. Archer. What is the object of having a stipulation in the articles of a company that a director should have qualification shares? It is to give him a personal interest in the affairs of the company, and to induce him to attend to them in a way very different from what he would if he had no interest in them at all. If there is a board of directors, some of whom have got that interest which they are intended to have, and some of whom have not because they are indemnified against all possible loss, can it be said that a bargain like that is one which is justifiable between a promoter and a director, and which does not bring the director within s. 165 if he receives anything by virtue of that bargain? It seems to me it is entirely fraudulent; fraudulent, I mean, in the sense that it was putting Mr. Archer in a position in which he was never intended to be by the articles or the constitution of this company.

It is said that there was no loss to the company. That is quite true if you look at the matter from one point of view; but it is not true if you look at it from another. It is quite true that the company, having got £500 in respect of those shares, have not lost anything by giving those shares to Mr. Archer. That is perfectly true; but when it is said that there is no loss to the company that is really begging the question. If this money which Mr. Archer got from Mr. Murray Smith ought to be accounted for to the company, the company loses if they do not get it. Then it is said that there is no profit to Mr. Archer. That again depends upon what stage of this proceeding you look. If you look at it from the beginning he has made no profit out of it. He paid £500 for his shares, and has got £500 back. But if you look at his position at the time he got the £500 he made a very large profit. The shares were his; they were not worth £500, they were worth nothing, and he got £500 for them. What is that, if he is accountable to the company in respect of that sum, but the loss caused to the company which they seek to avoid by making him liable? It was said that there is no dishonesty in the case. I do not pursue that further; I have said quite enough about that in my observations respecting the arrangement in general, which is not creditable to say the least of it.

That being the case, why does it not come within the principle to which I have alluded, and which is explained in that passage I read from the judgment of

A MELLISH, L.J.? Has not this gentleman obtained from Mr. Fisher in respect of his agency sums which, upon the principle which I have endeavoured to explain, are payable by him to the company? To say that they are the company's moneys is to use an ambiguous expression. In one sense unquestionably they are the company's moneys, that is to say, in the sense that the company are entitled to get them. In another sense, they are not the company's moneys, in the sense that the company cannot follow them, or, in the event of Mr. Archer's bankruptcy, they could not withdraw the money from his assets instead of ranking as creditors against his estate. The difference is explained in Lister & Co., Ltd. v. Stubbs (3).

B It is said that s. 165 has been expounded in Re Canadian Land Reclaiming and Colonizing Co., Coventry and Dixon's Case (4) and Cavendish Bentinck v. Fenn (2) in such a way as not to entitle the liquidator to recover the money, at all events in this form. In order that I may not make any mistake about it, I will turn to what LORD HERSCHELL said in Cavendish Bentinck v. Fenn (2). Observe why that case failed in the House of Lords. It was an application under s. 165 against a vendor to compel him to pay to the company certain money which was alleged to have been got from the company in excess of the value of the land sold. It was held that the application must be dismissed on two grounds, namely that the evidence adduced by the applicant had failed to show either that the director had not disclosed his interest or that the purchase price was above the value. If you once take that as an established fact it follows that the director there, Mr. Fenn, had not received any money which could be claimed, and the observations made by LORD HERSCHELL become perfectly intelligible.

E The present case proceeds upon the ground that Mr. Archer has received money to which the company is entitled, and the observation, therefore, that there has been no loss by the company, or that the liquidator cannot take out a summons under s. 165 unless he shows that the breach of duty has resulted in loss to the assets of the company, and that he has a direct pecuniary interest in the success of the application, is inapplicable to this case. In Cavendish Bentinck v. Fenn (2) it was put as a breach of trust—a breach of trust without any loss to the company.

F If that be so, of course there was nothing to recover, and the decision of the House of Lords showed that there was nothing to recover. Why? Because Mr. Fenn, not having received anything, ought not to be called upon to pay anything. If you once get the prior conclusion that the person proceeded against has received money to which the company is entitled, and does not pay it over, those observations of LORD HERSCHELL have no real bearing on the case before us. It seems to me,

G therefore, that this case is within the principle laid down in Hay's Case (1). Although in one sense the company have not lost money, in another sense they have been kept out of that which they have a right to retain and receive; and although in one sense Mr. Archer has not made any profit out of this transaction, in another and a very real sense he has, and that profit belonged to the company and not to himself. I think the learned judge has failed to do what is right in this case, and that Mr. Archer ought to be ordered to repay the money. As regards interest, we think it would be right to give interest from the date of the summons at 5 per cent. per annum. The liquidator is entitled to an inquiry whether Mr. Archer is to pay the whole £500, or only the difference between the actual value of the shares and the £500. The costs will include the costs here and the costs below.

I BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I will add some observations on the question that has been argued before us, out of respect to the learned judge in the court below, from whom we are differing. Mr. Archer was induced by a promoter of the company, who was acting in the interests of the vendor—induced, that is to say, by a person who stood in a fiduciary relation to the company—to become a director. In order to induce him to become a director, Mr. Murray Smith gave him a promise—afterwards fulfilled—to indemnify him against loss in respect of his qualification shares. The shares, when they were bought by Mr. Archer, were better stated than it was by MELLISH, L.J., in Hay's Case (1) (10 Ch. App. at A p. 601):

"There is no doubt about the rule of this court that an agent cannot, without the knowledge and consent of his principal, be allowed to make any profit out of the matter of his agency beyond his proper remuneration as agent. BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I will add some observations on the question that has been argued before us, out of respect to the learned judge in the court below, from whom we are differing. Mr. Archer was induced by a promoter of the company, who was acting in the interests of the vendor—induced, that is to say, by a person who stood in a fiduciary relation to the company—to become a director. In order to induce him to become a director, Mr. Murray Smith gave him a promise—afterwards fulfilled—to indemnify him against loss in respect of his qualification shares. The shares, when they were bought by Mr. Archer, were valuable things. In the course of time their value fell to nothing, the indemnity was made effective, and Mr. Archer emerged from the transaction, not, indeed, with a profit in one sense, but without the loss which otherwise he would have sustained. A

What is the true course of reasoning on the subject? As it seems to me, it is this. That promise of an indemnity, or that indemnity as I may call it, was a valuable consideration. It was not money, but it was money's worth, the measure and exact value of which depended upon the future, and events which have subsequently happened show that the measure and value of that indemnity was £500. B
The right to that indemnity when it was given, whether it was destined by fate to become an important thing or a less important thing, belonged to the company; their agent, their director, or the gentleman who was going to become their director, received it in order to induce him to become a director, and he received it from a person standing in a fiduciary relation to the company. What is the law? It is clear and simple. The company ought to have been told of the existence of that indemnity in order that they might elect whether they would let their director keep the advantage or not. As soon as the indemnity became fruitful, the money which arose from it became money for which the director, who had kept it secret, was bound to account to the company. That seems to me the law, and, differing from the learned judge whose judgment is under consideration, I cannot see that it can be truthfully said that there was no loss to the company. It is perfectly true that in one sense there was no loss; but in another sense there was. The loss was that the company did not get the benefit of the indemnity which ought to have been theirs, but that somebody else got it. They did not have accounted for to them the value of this indemnity as soon as it became valuable. They ought to have had it accounted for, and the non-accounting for it was a misfeasance. C

That I take to be the law, but is it not good sense and business as well as law? A promoter, who is acting in the interests of a vendor, is forming a company. A company is formed by which a director is to be qualified by the holding of fifty shares. What is the object of such a clause? Among others, that the company shall have the security that the director has some interest in the concern while he is acting as director, and that he shall not be simply in the position of a person who is playing ducks and drakes with other people's money. It is, so far, a shield to the company. The promoter who is promoting the company indemnifies the director against any loss on those shares, that is to say, he destroys by his agreement the one element which guarantees the company for the vigilance of their director. The director is a person placed on the board to watch, among other things, the proceedings of the promoter who is acting as agent for the vendor. Is it lawful, is it tolerable in equity or in law, that a promoter should be at liberty to have a director in his pay? Certainly not. But he is really having him in his pay if he is guaranteeing him against loss in respect of shares which the director is bound to hold to qualify himself under articles. As I said during the argument, the director is a watch dog, and the watch dog has no right, without the knowledge of his master, to take a sop from a possible wolf. F
H

The case seems to me to be clear, but the point was taken by Mr. Archer's counsel that there was no evidence here of non-disclosure to the other directors of the receipt of this promise of indemnity. That is a point which would have deserved attention if the case was being tried in the first instance, because the onus of proving misfeasance rests upon those who desire to prove it. But we have the facts illuminated by the light of the letters which passed between Mr. Archer and Mr. Murray Smith. Mr. Murray Smith gave the promise of the indemnity upon the terms that there should be no disclosure of what had been done. Mr. Archer, who accepted the indemnity on those terms, as an honest man must be taken to have carried them out. He does not repudiate the terms of Mr. Murray Smith; he accepts the indemnity and acts upon it. There is not a trace in the correspondence of any disclosure to the board, and when Mr. Archer goes into the box and is examined he does not suggest to his counsel, and his counsel does not I

A suggest to him in the questions he puts in examining him, that there ever was a disclosure of this indemnity, a matter which, it was agreed in the first instance, should be buried in silence. It would be puerile to allow a case clear in law against Mr. Archer to be defeated upon the ground that there is here no evidence of non-disclosure. There is evidence of non-disclosure enough to satisfy any court in feeling perfectly safe in acting upon it. I, at all events, have no hesitation in

B deciding that point against Mr. Archer, and I think, for the reasons which have been given by my learned brother, that Cavendish Bentinck v. Fenn (2) has no application. There is a difference between that case and this in the point he mentioned. I, therefore, agree that the appeal must be allowed with costs.

C FRY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The point which has been much pressed upon us is the want of any evidence of loss by the company as the result of this transaction. On principle, I do not think that that point can be maintained, and I can add nothing useful to what has been said by my learned brethren. But this observation I will make, that the argument appears to me to be inconsistent with two cases.

D In Hay's Case (1) the company agreed to pay a sum of money to the vendor of the property purchased. On one day they were paying a sum of £58,000 in part payment of that purchase money. Cheques were drawn in favour of the agent of the vendor, and one of those cheques was endorsed over to Sir John Hay. The company, therefore, was making a payment which they were bound to make, and they lost nothing in one sense by Sir John Hay receiving the money. The only loss they sustained was by Sir John Hay not accounting for it when he got it.

E It appears to me that there was exactly the same loss in that case, as far as loss is necessary, as there is in the present case. Again, in Re Caerphilly Colliery Co., Pearson's Case (5) the same observation can be made. The company there issued for some consideration or the other fully paid-up shares. Some of these shares were given by the promoter of the company to Sir Edwin Pearson. The company, therefore, got all they stipulated for in return for the shares that they issued and

F which were in Sir Edwin Pearson's hands, and yet because he ought not to have taken those fully paid-up shares, but ought to have paid the amount which was not payable by reason of the bargain between the company and the promoters, he was held liable to make good and treat the shares as if they were not paid-up at all. It might be said in both those cases (in Hay's Case (1) the payment was to the vendor, and in Pearson's Case (5) the payment was to the promoter) that the

G company lost nothing by the money in the one case and the shares in the other reaching the hands of the directors. But the court said that because the directors were accountable it did.

Those observations appear to me entirely to apply to the present case. It is quite true in this case that the company lost nothing, in this sense, that they received £500 for the shares. But they have not received the £500 which

H Mr. Archer has received by virtue of the indemnity which he obtained from the promoter. On principle, I think that those two cases are not distinguishable from the present. With regard to the question that there was a want of evidence in the present case of the non-disclosure of this bargain to the company, I am bound to say that to my mind the res ipsa almost convinces one that there was no disclosure. An agreement of this sort from its very nature is intended not to be

I disclosed. It is not one of those honest and straightforward transactions which men, who value their character or men of business, might desire to be disclosed. But if further evidence be wanted, I think it is abundantly found in the letter to which reference has been made. I think we should be closing our eyes to what are obviously the real facts of the case, and should be acting as men who were neglecting to take cognisance of the ordinary course of human affairs, and of the ordinary motives by which mankind is actuated, if we did not conclude from the facts before us that there was no disclosure of this letter to the company. With regard to the general law and the other branches of fact I have nothing to add. I can only express my entire concurrence in everything that has been said by my learned A brethren.

Rates—Rateable occupation—Enjoyment of easement—Easement requiring occupation of land for its exercise—Right to occupy conferred on grantee.

Mere enjoyment of an easement over land does not constitute rateable occupation of the land, but an easement or incorporeal right may be of such a character as requires the occupation of land for its exercise and confers on the grantee a right to occupy land during its continuance, and in such a case the grantee is in rateable occupation of the land.

Where a company was granted a right to adapt and use a tunnel and open cut for drainage purposes,

Held: the company was de facto in possession, for a purpose beneficial to themselves, of the space in the soil which their drainage works filled, and, therefore, they were in rateable occupation although they had no proprietary interest in the soil.

Rates—Rateable occupation—Question of fact—Irrelevance of legal title.

The question whether a person is in rateable occupation of land is a question of fact and does not depend on legal title. The person legally possessed may not occupy.

*Rates—Rateable occupation—Joint occupation of premises—Liability of occupier

Where persons are in joint occupation of premises he is in rateable occupation whose occupation is paramount. It is, therefore, necessary in such cases to consider what degree of right each party may have in the premises.

Consolidated Appeals from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., LOPES and KAY, L.JJ.), reversing a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (MATHEW and HENN COLLINS, JJ.), on a Case Stated by Flintshire Quarter Sessions. C

Dec. 17, 1894. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—By an Act passed in the year 1875, the respondent Company, the Halkyn District Mines Drainage Co., was incorporated. By s. 6 they were empowered to make and maintain certain tunnels described in the deposited plans and sections, and to enter upon, take, and use, or at their option to purchase, and take an easement in, through, over, or under, or right of using such of the lands described as might be required for that purpose. By s. 7 the company were empowered to purchase or lease a tunnel—known as the Halkyn Deep Level—and also an existing open cut or watercourse, or an easement, in, through, or over, or right of drainage through, or other right of using the same. In the event of the company acquiring the Halkyn Deep Level and existing cut, or any such easement or right, power was given to cleanse, deepen, widen, straighten, enlarge, divert, or improve the same. On Dec. 14, 1882, a deed of grant was made by the Duke of Westminster to the respondent company with the view of carrying out the object of the Act. I shall have presently to examine carefully the terms of this grant, as I think the decision of this case turns almost entirely upon what was its nature and effect. While the negotiations for the deed were proceeding, the respondent company had constructed a portion of the tunnel or level, and since the execution of the deed they have continued the tunnel or level for some distance further. They have also deepened the open cut, and built up the sides of it to prevent the loose ground of the hillside from slipping into it. They have also substantially and permanently repaired the tunnel. In carrying out the works they placed in the tunnel a quantity of iron tubing of oval shape about five feet high, and, as to part thereof, arched the same over with fire bricks, and in other ways supported the roof. E F

Under these circumstances, the question arose whether the respondent company were liable to be rated as occupiers of the tunnels and open cut to which I have referred. Quarter sessions held that they were so liable, subject to a Case which they stated for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division. MATHEW and HENN COLLINS, JJ., were of opinion that the decision of the sessions was right. On appeal this decision was reversed. The Court of Appeal were of opinion that the effect of the deed was to convey to the respondent company an easement only. If this view be correct, I think there can be no doubt that the conclusion that the respondent company are not rateable necessarily followed. In the Court of Appeal it was, I gather, argued on behalf of the present appellants that the G H I

A ownership of the tunnel was by the deed of grant conveyed to them. In consequence, probably, of the line of argument adopted, the case appears to have been treated by the learned judges as one in which the only alternative views were ownership or easement. I do not think that this is so. No doubt, if it could be shown that the respondent company were the owners of the tunnel, this would negative the idea of their being entitled merely to an easement, and, B being owners, they would, prima facie, be the occupiers; they would be so regarded unless the occupation were shown to be in some one else. But even if it be established that on the true construction of the deed they are not owners, it does not follow that they were possessed of an easement only and were not occupiers. There may be occupation without even the existence of the relation of tenant towards the owner of the property. And I think land may be occupied C for the purpose of and in connection with the enjoyment of an easement in such a manner as to make the person so occupying liable to be rated. I will refer later on to the authorities which appear to me to support this view.

I turn now to a consideration of the terms of the grant. It grants, first:

D "all such easements in and through and right of drainage through and other and exclusive rights of using (but subject nevertheless and except and reserving as hereinafter mentioned) the Halkyn Deep Level hereinbefore described and shown on the said plan by the colours black and pink as may be necessary or convenient for the purposes of the said Act or of the said company's undertaking or any of such purposes together with power from time to time to uphold, maintain, cleanse, repair, scour, deepen, widen, straighten, alter, enlarge, divert, and improve the said Halkyn Deep Level, when and to such E extent as may be necessary or convenient for the purposes of the said Act or of the said company's undertaking."

It further grants:

F "full right and liberty at any time and from time to time hereafter to make, form, construct, maintain, and exclusively use (but subject nevertheless and except and reserving as hereinafter mentioned) under or through any land within the said area No. 1, of which the said duke is legal tenant for his own life, or of or to which he is seised or entitled for any greater estate, tunnels in continuation of or in connection with the said Halkyn Deep Level as now existing and shown on the said plan by the colours black and pink, the limit of which land towards the south is shown by a line on the said plan, and to G make, construct, execute, and do all such works and things as shall be necessary or convenient for that purpose."

Then follow the words, "and such easements," etc., in precisely the same terms as in the first grant.

H Both these grants are made subject to, and there is excepted and reserved from them, what is afterwards mentioned. These exceptions and reservations seem to me to throw much light upon the effect of the grant, and upon the question whether all that passed by it to the drainage company was a mere easement. In the first place, there is excepted and reserved to the duke

"all lead and lead ore which in making or extending the tunnels and works shall be found discovered or gotten."

I Next, there is reserved to the duke and his assigns

"the right to use the Halkyn Deep Level and the tunnels to be made by the drainage company as aforesaid for searching for and working the mines and beds of lead, lead ore and blende which can conveniently be sought for, obtained, and gotten by communications with or otherwise by means of the said Halkyn Deep Level and tunnels, or any of them respectively, or any part or parts thereof respectively, and for removing through or by means of the said Halkyn Deep Level and tunnels, or any of them respectively, or any part or parts thereof respectively, and through or by means of any shafts, levels, and drifts, in use by the said company, all lead, lead ore, and blende, which may be so obtained and gotten, and all débris and waste materials necessary or convenient to be removed in searching for, obtaining, and getting such lead, lead ore, and blende."

If all that was intended to be granted was an easement to allow the drainage water to pass along the tunnels, and the possession of the tunnels remained in the duke (which is the hypothesis contended for by the respondents), it is difficult to understand how these rights, which the duke was to have in relation to the tunnels, were treated as exceptions and reservations out of and from the grant to the drainage company, and were conferred upon the duke in the manner in which they have been by the deed.

The matter does not stop there, because in a subsequent part of the deed there is a covenant by the respondent company, in the following terms:

"And also will from time to time and at all reasonable times permit and suffer the said duke and his assigns or the owner or owners for the time being of the lands shown on the said plan of which the said duke is legal tenant for his own life, or of or to which he is seised or entitled for any greater estate, and his and their agents and surveyors, to go down, dial, and measure all and every or any of the said Halkyn Deep Level and tunnels, and shafts and other works of the said company at all convenient times, and for that purpose to make use of all machinery in and about such works, he or they not unnecessarily obstructing or interfering with the user of the said level, tunnels, shafts, and works, for the purpose of the said company's undertaking, or obstructing or hindering further than need shall absolutely require the said company, their successors or assigns, or their servants, in the prosecution of any of their works or operations."

If the company were to have an easement only, and were not to be in possession of the tunnels and works which they constructed, and the duke was to remain in possession of them, it is difficult to understand why a covenant should be taken to "permit and suffer the duke to go down dial and measure" the tunnels and shafts. It is true that the first grant confers such exclusive rights of using the level as may be necessary or convenient for the purposes of the Act, but they have power to enlarge and divert the level, and for that purpose to enter upon the duke's lands which adjoin or are near to the level. With regard to the new tunnel, as I have already shown, in addition to the grant of easements and exclusive rights, full right is given to make and exclusively use the tunnels, subject only to the exception or reservation in the duke's favour. The exceptions are followed by a proviso "that the rights under the exceptions and reservations hereinbefore contained shall not be used or exercised so as to obstruct, hinder, delay, or interfere with the prosecution by the said company of any works or operations of the said company under the authority of these presents, or for the purposes of the said Act, or of the said company's undertaking, or to the damage, injury, or prejudice of the said level, tunnels, and shafts, or any other works of the said company, or so as to obstruct or interfere with the free flow of water through the said level or any of the tunnels and levels of the said company, or with the user for the purposes of the said Act, or of the said company's undertaking of the said level, or any of the tunnels, levels, and works of the said company."

This is not all. It is also provided that the rights under the exceptions and reservations contained in the deed shall not be exercised or exercisable except subject to the provisions of the Act and such byelaws allowed in manner provided by the Act as shall for the time being be in force. The Act, by s. 45, makes it unlawful for any person without the written consent of the company first had and obtained, and then only subject to such conditions and regulations

A as should be prescribed by the company "to make or form any communication to or with the tunnels and levels or other works of the company." So it is clear that the duke can have no rights in respect of the tunnels except those expressly reserved to him by agreement in the deed of grant. By s. 46 of the Act the company are authorised to make byelaws for the protection of their works, and "for preventing the flow, escape, or percolation of water by any means inconsistent with those prescribed or provided by the company."

B It seems to me clear, therefore, that with regard to these tunnels the rights of the respondents are paramount, and those of the duke are subordinate to them. Upon a careful consideration of the terms of the deed of grant I am unable to adopt the conclusion that it conferred upon the respondents an easement or rights in the nature of an easement only. I think that it gave them the possession of the tunnels of which they thus have the exclusive use for purposes of drainage, and that such rights as remained in the duke were only those expressly reserved to him, and which were subordinate to those possessed by the company. If the possession thus became theirs it is quite immaterial to my mind for the present purpose whether they became the owners or not. Along the tunnel for a considerable distance the company have placed iron tubing; in parts they have placed brick arches; it seems to me that in these parts they occupy land precisely in the same sense as a water company does by its pipes, or a tramway company by its rails, or a telephone company by the supports for its wires. As to those parts of the tunnel which are so occupied, I can see no substantial distinction between the present case and those in which it has been held that water companies, tramway companies, and telephone companies, are rateable. But even as to the part where there is no tubing or arches, I think the respondents are in possession. They may at any time place such works in any parts of the tunnel that they please, and, as I have already pointed out, it rests with them not only in the first instance to determine the direction of the tunnel, but at any time they please to divert it and alter its direction.

F The question whether a person is an occupier or not within the rating law is a question of fact, and does not depend upon legal title. The person legally possessed may not occupy. On the other hand, a person may be occupier either with or without the consent of the owner. In R. v. Chelsea Water Works Co. (1), a water company to whom the Crown granted the right to lay down their pipes were held by the Court of King's Bench to be occupiers of land, and liable to be rated. In Pimlico Tramway Co. v. Greenwich (2), a tramway company was held liable in respect of the occupation of the road by their tramways. They were certainly not the owners of any part of the road; they were merely authorised to lay down the rails thereon. The only right which they possessed was an exclusive right of using those rails by carriages with flanged wheels; the public retained the right to pass over them, and use them in any other way; the company were, nevertheless, held liable to be rated. In Lancashire Telephone Co. v. Manchester Overseers (3), a telephone company were held liable to be rated in respect of their wires and poles where the poles were attached to the roofs or walls of houses by the permission of the occupier, who, nevertheless, retained complete control of the building so that the company could only obtain access to the roof by his permission. LINDLEY, L.J., there said:

I "The distinction between an easement of support and the occupation of that which affords support is often very fine. I think the telephone company occupy land in the same sense as many other persons who have been grantees of easements, and have been held rateable."

In the present case, for the reasons I have given, I think that the respondents, and not the duke, were the occupiers of the tunnels and works for rating purposes. It was strongly contended, on behalf of the respondents, that they could not be liable to be rated, inasmuch as they were not in exclusive occupation. There are many cases where two persons may without impropriety, be said to occupy the same land, and the question has sometimes arisen which of them is rateable. Where a person already in possession has given to another possession of a part of his premises, if that possession be not exclusive he does not cease to be liable to the rate, nor does the other become so. A familiar illustration of this occurs in the case of a landlord and his lodger. Both are in a sense in occupation, but the occupation of the landlord is paramount—that of the lodger, subordinate. In the present case, in my opinion, on the true construction of the deed, the possession of the respondents is paramount, and any rights which the duke has are subordinate. The respondents alone have the right of using the tunnels for the primary purpose for which they have been constructed. The duke has no such right, and, in my opinion, the respondents are in occupation of the tunnels and works.

I arrive at the conclusion I have indicated, differing as it does from the Court of Appeal, with the less hesitation, inasmuch as the contention before them appears to have been, on the one side, that an easement only was granted; on the other, that the respondents were owners of the tunnels and works. The view which was presented to your Lordships that the respondents might be in occupation of the land, even though the purpose for which it was to be used was in the nature of an easement, does not appear to have been before them. No reference was made to the works they had actually constructed in the tunnels, or to the cases which I have cited which seem to me to have so direct a bearing upon the question to be determined. I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division restored, and that the respondents should pay the costs here and in the courts below.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—If it had not been common ground that the possession of the Halkyn District Mines Drainage Co. was in conformity with their documentary title, it would, I think, have been more than doubtful whether the Court of Appeal were right in treating the question before them as a question of construction. Liability to rates is not a question of title. The question in each case must be whether there is, in fact, such an occupation as according to the Statute of Elizabeth and a course of decisions which have been recognised and established as law carries with it liability for rating purposes. In the present case, however, it is not suggested, on the one hand, that the possession of the company is greater, or, on the other hand, that it is in any respect less, than the possession authorised by the combined operation of the Act of Parliament and the deed of grant. Therefore, I think, it is sufficient, as it certainly is convenient, to limit the inquiry to the consideration of the question what were the rights conferred upon the company, taking for granted that whatever was intended to be conferred has been actually enjoyed.

Then it is necessary to consider both the Act of Parliament and the deed. The Act is, I think, the more important of the two. The learned judges of the Court of Appeal, confining their attention to the deed and scarcely noticing the Act of Parliament, have held that nothing passed but a mere easement. If that be the true view there is no liability to rates, but I cannot help thinking that the company acquired much more than a mere easement or a mere right of passage for the water which it was their object and their statutory duty to clear off. The Halkyn District Mines Drainage Act, 1875, incorporates the company "for the purpose of making and maintaining the tunnels or adit levels and other works therein mentioned," and it expressly authorises the company to make use and maintain the said tunnels or adit levels, with all proper shafts, works, and conveniences connected therewith, and to enter upon, take and use, or (at their option) to purchase and take an easement in, through, over or under, or right of using such of the lands delineated on the deposited plans, and described in the books of reference as might be required for that purpose. The Act proceeds to describe the authorised tunnels, one of which was to join an existing

A tunnel called the Halkyn Deep Level, which communicated with an open cut or watercourse, running into Nant-y-Flint brook. The Act then authorises the company for the purposes of the Act to purchase, lease or otherwise acquire by compulsion or agreement, the Halkyn Deep Level and the said open cut or watercourse, "or an easement in, through, or over, or right of drainage through, or other right of using the same." There follows a section which seems to me to have some bearing on the question before your Lordships. It is s. 8. It authorises the company in the event of their acquiring the Halkyn Deep Level and the said open cut or watercourse, "or any such easement or right as aforesaid," from time to time to deepen, widen, alter, divert, and improve the same.

It will be observed that the statutory powers of the company in this respect are precisely the same, whether they do or do not acquire any proprietary right in the soil. The same observation applies to other provisions of the Act. Section 45 provides that without the written consent of the company, and then only subject to such conditions and regulations as shall be prescribed by the company, no communication shall be made to or with the tunnels and levels, or other works of the company. Section 46 empowers the company to make byelaws for the protection of their works, for the protection of their rights under the Act, and for preventing the flow of water by any means inconsistent with those prescribed or provided by the company. These provisions are general and wholly independent of any question as to the acquisition by the company of any proprietary rights in the soil. It is only necessary to add that the Act empowers the company to make extensions to their works on acquiring by agreement such land or such right in, through, or over such land as may be required for the purpose, and that in consideration of their services the company are authorised to levy tolls within the drainage district. The position of the company was, therefore, assured by the Act subject to their acquiring either such interest in the land, or such rights in, through, or over the land, as might be required for the construction of their works. For all practical purposes the position of the company in regard to their authorised works would be precisely the same, whichever of the two alternatives might be adopted.

Such being the effect of the Act—the company having made some progress with the proposed works—the Duke of Westminster, who was the statutory owner of the land within the drainage area, made a grant to the company on Dec. 14, 1882. So far as the present question is concerned the company did not acquire any proprietary interest in any part of the land which they were authorised to take. Subject to certain reservations, the effect of which will be considered presently, the duke granted to the company all such easements in and through, and right of drainage through, and other and exclusive rights of using the Halkyn Deep Level, the open cut or watercourse, and any tunnels that might be constructed within the drainage area in continuation of, or in connection with the Halkyn Deep Level as might be necessary or convenient for the purposes of the Act, or of the company's undertaking, or any of such purposes. Putting aside for a moment the reservations contained in the deed of grant, can there be any doubt as to the position of the company for rating purposes as regards their authorised works? The numerous cases relating to gas companies, water companies, and tramways, put the matter beyond question. To borrow the language of WIGHTMAN, J., in R. v. West Middlesex Waterworks Co. (4), the company are de facto in possession of the space in the soil which their drainage works fill for a purpose beneficial to themselves, and it is immaterial here, as it was there, and the company have no proprietary interest in the soil.

I now come to the reservations contained in the deed of grant. They are three in all. First there is a reservation of certain mineral substances which might be found in the course of making or extending the works. That reservation cannot affect the present question. Then there is a reservation of the use of the drainage works for the purpose of searching for, and working mines and carrying away ore and waste materials. Lastly, there is a reservation of the use of two specified shafts, the use of which had been granted to the company, and any other shafts which might be made or used by the company. The material reservation is the second. That reservation, if it were unqualified and unlimited as regards the use of it, might no doubt interfere with the operations of the company. But then we find an express proviso and declaration to the effect that the rights under the reservations contained in the deed of grant, shall not be used so as to interfere with the operations of the company under the authority of the deed, or for the purposes of the Act or of the company's undertaking, or with the user for the purposes of the Act, or of the company's undertaking of the drainage works of the company, and that the rights under the reservations contained in the deed shall not be exercised or exercisable except subject to the provisions of the Act and the company's byelaws for the time being in force.

It is, therefore, perfectly clear that the rights reserved by the duke were intended to be, and in fact are, secondary, inferior, and subordinate to the rights of the company under their Act. If there is any likelihood of a conflict, the right reserved by the duke must give way. The rights of the company are paramount. They have the sole and exclusive right of using their drainage works so far as those works may be required for the purposes of their undertaking. The deed of grant was not, I think, meant in the slightest degree to derogate from the statutory rights of the company, but simply to enable the company to avail themselves of those rights, and at the same time to reserve for the use of the duke certain rights and facilities qualified and limited in such a manner as to prevent the possibility of their ever coming into competition with the statutory rights of the company. It appears to me that, under the circumstances, such rights of user as are reserved by the duke no more negative the occupation of the company for rating purposes, than the presence of a lodger interferes with the rateability of the householder. I am consequently of opinion that the company are liable to be rated in respect of their occupation for their drainage works, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed.

LORD DAVEY.—It would appear from the judgments delivered by the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, that the point to which their attention was directed was whether the drainage company had any right of ownership in the tunnels and watercourse in question in the case, or had only an easement or incorporeal right over them, and their decision was against the overseers, the present appellants, on the ground that the company were not owners, but had a mere easement. It may be, that the course which the argument had taken before the Court of Appeal is the explanation of the reasons for the judgments taking that form. I agree with the learned judges in the Court of Appeal that the drainage company are not owners of the soil of the tunnels or watercourse. But that does not seem to me conclusive on the question of their rateability in respect of their occupation. The right of the company may be an easement or incorporeal right, but the easement may be of such a character as requires the occupation of land for its exercise, and confers upon the company a right to occupy land during its continuance. According to a long course of authority, the occupation of land under such circumstances is sufficient for rating purposes, though unaccompanied by ownership of any portion of the soil.

The law was thus stated by WIGHTMAN, J., in R. v. West Middlesex Waterworks (4) (1 E. & E. at p. 720) :

"In this case the first question is whether the company are rateable for their mains which are laid under the surface of the highway without any freehold or leasehold interest in the soil thereof being vested in the company; we think they are. The mains are fixed capital vested in land. The company is in possession of the mains buried in the soil, and so is de facto in possession of that space in the soil which the mains fill for a purpose beneficial

A to itself. The decisions are uniform in holding gas companies to be rateable in respect of their mains although the occupation of such mains may be de facto merely, and without any legal or equitable estate in the land where the mains lie by force of some statute."

B In one of the earliest cases, R. v. Chelsea Water Works Co. (1), the waterworks company were held rateable in respect, not only of pipes laid underground, but of a reservoir in the Green Park which had formerly been a pond, and was used by the company as part of their works under a revocable licence from the Crown. The same principle has been applied in Cory v. Bristow (5) in this House, to moorings in the Thames maintained there under licence from the conservators, and in the recent cases of Pimlico Tramway Co. v. Greenwich (2),
C and Lancashire Telephone Co. v. Manchester Overseers (3), to a tramway laid on a public road, and telephone wires suspended on the chimneys of buildings in a town.

The question whether the company sought to be rated are owners of the soil may be very material in some cases in determining whether they are in occupation or are merely enjoying the same rights as the general public, or a number of other persons, as was held in R. v. Mersey and Irwell Navigation Co. of Proprietors (6), and recently in this House in Doncaster Union Assessment Committee v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (7). But, after all, the real question is not whether their rights are corporeal or incorporeal, but whether the company is de facto in occupation of some portion of the soil. I need not state again the facts of this case, but, looking at the description of the works in the Special Case, I cannot doubt that the company occupy with their tunnel
E the portion of ground in which the tunnel is constructed, and also those portions which are inclosed within the tunnel, and used by the company for the purpose of their undertaking. And I also think with HENN COLLINS, J., that they have a similar occupation of that portion of their works which consists of an open cut or watercourse. I am further of opinion, looking at the provisions of the company's Act of Parliament, that such occupation and right of user was
F necessary for the execution by the company of the purposes of the Act, and I think it was conferred on the company by the deed of grant from the Duke of Westminster.

But then it is said that the occupation is not exclusive inasmuch as the Duke of Westminster has reserved certain rights to himself and his licensees over the tunnels and watercourses, and in pursuance of such reserved rights the Halkyn Mining Co. have laid a tramway along one of the tunnels, and have placed
G ventilating pipes there. Two questions arise: What is meant by exclusive occupation when used in connection with the subject of rating? And what are the conditions subject to which the duke exercises his reserved rights? It is clear that exclusive occupation does not mean that nobody else has any rights in the premises. The familiar case of landlord and lodger is an illustration. The cases show that if a person has only a subordinate occupation, subject at all
H times to the control and regulation of another, then that person has not occupation in the strict sense for the purpose of rating, but the rateable occupation remains in the other, who has the right of regulation and control. This was so held in Smith v. St. Michael, Cambridgeshire Overseers (8), in London and North Western Rail. Co. v. Buckmaster (9), and in the recent case of Rochdale Canal Co. v. Brewster (10). As I took part in the decision of the latter case in the
I Court of Appeal I will not repeat what was said in the judgments: see also the judgment of LORD BLACKBURN in Cory v. Bristow (5), in the Court of Appeal. It is necessary in cases of apparent joint occupation to consider what degree of right each party may have in the premises. In the present case your Lordships will find on reference to the deed of grant of Dec. 14, 1882, that it purports to grant such exclusive rights of using as may be necessary for the company's statutory purposes, but subject and except and reserving as hereinafter mentioned. The reservation to the duke is (i) of all lead, ore, or blende;

(ii) the right to use the Halkyn Deep Level and other tunnels for working and removing the reserved minerals; (iii) a right of user (which is expressed to be subsidiary to the right of user by the company) of any shafts made by the company on payment of a contribution to maintenance and repair; and the reservation is subject to a proviso that the reserved rights shall not be used so as to interfere with the company's operations, and shall not be exercised except subject to the provisions of the Act, and such byelaws allowed in manner provided by the Act as shall for the time being be in force. If your Lordships now turn to the Act you will find that by s. 45 it is made unlawful for any person without the written consent of the company, and then only subject to such conditions and regulations as shall be made by the company to make any communication with the tunnels or levels or other works of the company. And by s. 40 the company is empowered to make byelaws for the protection of the works of the company and other purposes. In these circumstances, I have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the exercise by the duke and his tenants and licensees of the rights reserved to them is subordinate to the occupation of the company for the purposes of their undertaking, and does not confer on the duke's tenants or licensees, such an occupation as prevents the occupation of the company being exclusive in the sense in which I have used that expression. Consequently, I am of opinion that the company has a rateable occupation, and that the order of the Court of Appeal should be discharged, and the order of the Divisional Court restored.

HAMLIN & CO. v. J. C. WOOD & CO.

Contract—Implied term—Need to have been in contemplation of parties when contract made—Need to be necessary and reasonable.

There cannot be implied into a written contract any stipulation unless it be such that both parties must have had it in their contemplation at the time of making the contract, and must have intended that such stipulation should be a binding stipulation upon them. It is not enough that the stipulation should be a reasonable one. It must be a necessary, as well as a reasonable, stipulation.

By a written agreement the defendants agreed to sell, and the plaintiffs agreed to buy, all the grains made by the defendants at certain current rates charged each year by specified brewers, from July 10, 1885, to Sept. 30, 1895. The quantity of grains was to be calculated monthly, and payment was to be made on or before the last day in the month following delivery. The contract was duly performed until September, 1890, when the defendants sold their business. In an action for damages for breach of contract the plaintiffs contended that there was to be implied in the contract a stipulation that the defendants would not wilfully do any act, such as selling their business, which would put it out of their power to perform the contract for the specified ten years.

Held: it could not be inferred that the parties had intended to import into the contract a stipulation that the defendants would carry on their business for the ten years mentioned in the contract, and, therefore, such a term was not to be implied in the contract and the plaintiffs' claim must fail.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of MATHEW, J., on the trial of the action with a special jury, whereby he directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs, Hamlyn & Co., were a firm which bought grains from brewers, and sold them in smaller quantities to cowkeepers and others for the purpose of fodder. The defendants, J. C. Wood & Co., were formerly brewers carrying on business in Westminster.

By an agreement in writing between the parties, dated July 14, 1885:

"The said J. C. Wood & Co. hereby agree to sell, and the said Hamlyn & Co. agree to buy, all the grains made by the said J. C. Wood & Co., at the current rates charged each year by the following firms, viz., Messrs. Truman, Hanbury, Buxton & Co., Messrs. Barclay, Perkins & Co., Messrs. Combe & Co., Messrs. Watney & Co., Messrs. Reid & Co., from July 10, 1885, until Sept. 30, 1895, inclusive. In the event of there being any difference in the above firms' rates, then the average price charged shall be taken as the current rate. The quantity of grains to be calculated monthly, and payment for the same to be made at the brewery on or before the last day in the month following delivery, the first payment to be made on or before Aug. 30, 1885, and so on. The quantity of grains to be charged for according to the number of quarters of malt put in the mash tun, and all grains to be considered as ale grains when brewed without black malt. The said Hamlyn & Co. agree to throw the grains out of the mash tub, and empty and clear away the same in a proper and workmanlike manner at their sole expense on the day on which they are made, and to pay for any damage done by carelessness of the persons employed by them; otherwise, the said J. C. Wood & Co. to be at liberty to cart away and dispose of the grains in the best manner they in their opinion can, and such carting and disposal to be made at Hamlyn & Co.'s cost, and any loss made by such sale shall be sustained by the said Hamlyn & Co."

A This contract was duly performed on both sides from July, 1885, down to July 31, 1890, but in August, 1890, the defendants sold to Messrs. Watney & Co. the goodwill of their business as brewers, though not the premises on which the business had been carried on. In consequence of such sale the defendants were unable to perform the contract, and were unable to and did not make or supply to the plaintiffs any more grains. The plaintiffs brought the present action alleging
 B breach of the contract by the defendants, and claiming £1,500 damages, being the estimated loss of profits on the purchase of the grains for the five years from August, 1890, to September, 1895, at the rate of £300 a year. The defendants in their defence stated that in the agreement they did not undertake to continue to carry on their business for any definite time; that they did not, even while they carried on the business, undertake to make any particular or definite quantity of
 C grains; and that, consequently, as a matter of law the plaintiffs' action was not maintainable. The defendants counterclaimed for a sum of £97 for grains already sold and delivered, which counterclaim was admitted by the plaintiffs subject to their claim.

MATHEW, J., in summing up the case to the jury, put to them the question what was the meaning of the contract. In doing so he said he thought it desirable to
 D do what he had often done before with the sanction of superior authority, namely, to ask business men, such as the jury were, what their view of such a contract was. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs on the claim for £350, and for the defendants on the counterclaim for £97. On a submission by the defendants that, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, judgment ought to be entered for the defendants, MATHEW, J., said that the defendants were perfectly at liberty, if they
 E chose, to sell their business and so deprive themselves of the power to carry out their contract, but, if they did so, they broke their contract, and there must be judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount assessed by the jury. The defendants appealed.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The question we have to decide is whether we agree with MATHEW, J., in the indication of his views of the case. A large number of cases have been cited, but, in my opinion, it is useless to quote such cases for the
 G purpose of showing that in this or that particular case some implication was or was not drawn. The only use of quoting such a case is, where the case is one in which a rule is laid down as to these implications, which the court will act upon in dealing with other cases which may be before the court. I have always understood the rule as to such implications to be that you cannot import into a written contract any such stipulation unless it be such that both parties had it in their contemplation at the time of making the contract; in other words, that both parties,
 H looking at the matter in a reasonable and businesslike way, must have intended that that stipulation should be a binding stipulation upon them both. It is not enough to say that the implication is a reasonable one to make under the circumstances. It must also be a necessary implication, as well as a reasonable one. That rule has been expanded by BOWEN, L.J., in The Moorcock (1), where he says (14 P.D. at p. 68):

I "Now, an implied warranty, or, as it is called, a covenant in law, as distinguished from an express contract or express warranty, really is in all cases founded on the presumed intention of the parties, and upon reason. The implication which the law draws from what must obviously have been the intention of the parties, the law draws with the object of giving efficacy to the transaction, and preventing such a failure of consideration as cannot have been within the contemplation of either side; and I believe, if one were to take all the cases, and they are many, of implied warranties or covenants in law, it will be found that in all of them the law is raising an implication from the presumed intention of the parties with the object of giving to the transaction such efficacy as both parties must have intended that at all events it should have. In business transactions such as this, what the law desires to effect by the implication, is to give such business efficacy to the transaction, as must have been intended at all events by both parties, who are business men; not to impose on one side all the perils of the transaction, or to emancipate one side from all the chances of failure, but to make each party promise in law as much, at all events, as it must have been in the contemplation of both parties that he should be responsible for in respect of those perils or chances."

I think that is an expansion of the rule I have already enunciated. When you have to imply a stipulation into a written contract it is the court which must imply it, and not the jury, who have nothing to do with the construction of written contracts, but have merely to find the facts if they are asked to do so.

To see if the stipulation is implied in the present case we must first see what the stipulation is. It is an admitted fact that there is no express stipulation of the kind relied on, so that the plaintiffs are compelled to fall back upon an implied stipulation. What is the stipulation the plaintiffs wish to import into this case? They say: "We do not ask the court to imply a stipulation that the defendants contracted to carry on their business for ten years so as to produce grains to sell to the plaintiffs; but we do ask the court to imply a promise to us by the defendants that they (the defendants) would not do anything wilfully to get rid of their business, and so prevent them carrying out their contract with us." If you cannot imply the first of these stipulations it would be extraordinary to imply the second. The defendants stipulate expressly that they agree to sell "all the grains made by them." What is the meaning of that clause? It must mean "made by them in their business as brewers." The plaintiffs agree to buy all those same grains. The one party then agrees to sell those grains, and the other agrees to buy those grains for the ten years; that is, the defendants agree to sell, and the plaintiffs agree to buy, all the grains made by the defendants for ten years. The plaintiffs are business men; what do they gain by this contract? If it is construed against their contention, still do they make nothing out of it? What is their advantage? Their advantage consists in this, that they think it profitable to get all those grains for ten years in preference to any other purchasers. If the agreement had been that the plaintiffs were to pay a sum down and then to have the grains for ten years, so that if they did not get the grains for ten years they would not get what they had paid for, that case would be different; but in this case the plaintiffs are not to pay for those grains which they do not get; they are to pay only for the quantity of grains which they may obtain from time to time. That payment may be taken as a fixed sum, and the plaintiffs would have to pay that fixed sum for such grains as they got; if they got none, they would have nothing to pay.

Such being the terms of the contract, then comes the question: Can the court, looking at this contract in a reasonable and businesslike way, say it is a necessary implication that both parties must have contemplated as an element in the contract that these brewers would carry on their business for ten years? Can the court say it is a necessary implication that the defendants undertook that they would not sell their business during the ten years, at whatever loss they might carry it on, or however advantageous might be the terms which they were offered for it? Or, again, can the court say that, although the defendants do not undertake that they will carry on the business for the whole of the ten years, yet they do undertake that they will not wilfully put an end to the business during that time? I do not say that these two things are just the same, but I think they are as like each other as twin brothers. I think that such an implication as that is beyond all bounds, and I think the court ought not to make such an implication in this case. That being so, I wilfully abstain from going into the cases to see what the courts did or what implications they made in other cases, and I give no opinion about those cases.

A If that implication is not made in this case, there is no breach of the contract by the defendants, and, therefore, I dissent from the view taken by the learned judge below, and for these reasons I think judgment ought to be entered for the defendants.

B BOWEN, L.J.—With great respect to the learned judge in the court below, I must say that I differ entirely from the conclusion to which he came. I agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said, and I object on principle to examine a number of cases to see what the courts may have held in similar cases as to implications arising from expressions used in those contracts. It may be necessary in some cases, in order to give effect to a transaction, that the law should imply a stipulation not wilfully to put an end to a business, although the parties themselves C had not made any such stipulation in their agreement. The question now is whether such an implication is necessary in this case, or whether the contract may not be capable of a reasonable construction without such implication. I feel no doubt at all that to impose this new term upon the parties would be to impose a term which was not in the contemplation of the parties at the time of the making of the contract. I will not repeat what I said in The Moorcock (1), and, for the D reasons given by the Master of the Rolls, I think we ought not to make the implication we are asked to make in this case.

E KAY, L.J.—When parties have reduced to writing the terms upon which they agree, especially in the case of mercantile contracts, it seems to me that it would be a very strong and dangerous thing to import into the written contract a term F which is not in that contract. Here it is admitted that there has been no breach of an express provision of the contract. That contract merely amounts to an engagement by the defendants to sell to the plaintiffs all grains made by them in their business as brewers for ten years, not for a sum paid down, but at a current price to be ascertained in the manner provided for in the agreement. The defendants for a time carried out this contract by selling grains to the plaintiffs, but G within the ten years they sold their business, and the purchasers refused to adopt the contract. The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action, and in effect they say to the defendants: "True you have not said that during the period of the ten years you would not sell the business, but that term is implied in the contract."

I agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls, that you ought not to interpret into a contract an implied condition unless there is a necessary implication H to or inference that the parties intended to import it into their agreement. To state the rule in wider terms than this would, it seems to me, be going beyond what could be justified on principle. All the cases that have been cited are merely instances where the case falls on one side or the other of this line, and in the cases where the implication was made it was because the court was of necessity led to imply a term in order to carry out what was clearly the intention of the parties. Another limitation I take to be established by the language of Cockburn, C.J., in Stirling v. Maitland (2), when he says (5 B. & S. at p. 852):

I "I look on the law to be that, if a party enters into an arrangement, which can only take effect by the continuance of a certain existing state of circumstances, there is an implied engagement on his part that he shall do nothing of his own motion to put an end to that state of circumstances under which alone the arrangement can be operative."

In the present case it seems to me to be very reasonable indeed to conclude that all that either party intended was that, if the defendants carried on their business as brewers for ten years, they would sell to the plaintiffs all the grains produced in their business during that time, if they so long carried on the business, at the current prices ascertained as mentioned in the contract. It might have been different altogether if the defendants had been paid for the supply of the grains for the whole of the ten years. I will not express any opinion as to what the effect of such a contract would have been, but in that case it would have been much more difficult for the defendants to succeed, and the argument in favour of the plaintiffs would have been very much stronger than in the present case for implying an agreement by the defendants that they would not by any wilful act prevent themselves from carrying out the contract for ten years. Here, if we were to imply the condition that we are asked to imply, we should be doing what the parties had never intended. I am not satisfied that either party ever intended that the defendants should not sell the business for the ten years. I think, therefore, upon these grounds that the case does not come within the principle upon which such implications are made, and, in my opinion, judgment ought to be for the defendants.

Company—Winding-up—Surplus assets—Distribution—Reserve funds—Not required for purposes for which set aside.

The capital of a company consisted of 100,000 ordinary shares of £10 each and 30,000 preference shares of £10 each, carrying a preferential dividend of 5 per cent. The articles gave the directors power to set aside out of the profits of the company such sums as they should think fit for a reserve fund, and provided that, subject thereto, the profits should belong to the shareholders. Acting under these powers the directors set aside out of the profits earned by the company three reserve funds for three specified purposes, but when the company went into liquidation, on the sale of its assets to another company, these funds had not been required for the purposes for which they had been set apart.

Held: (i) when the reserve funds were formed they consisted of undistributed profits; carrying such profits to reserve did not change their character, still less their ownership; and when the purposes for which the money had been set apart failed it became divisible, not as capital, but as undrawn profits to which the ordinary shareholders were entitled; (ii) furthermore, the ordinary shareholders were entitled to have an account taken from the date of the last balance-sheet to the date of sale, in which the amounts actually received on the sale of the plant, fixtures, etc., and also the amounts actually realised and paid in respect of the debts owing to and by the company, must be inserted instead of the estimated amounts thereof as in former balance-sheets; and the balance of profits shown upon the account ought to be paid to the ordinary shareholders, as the difference between the estimated and ascertained value must also be treated as undrawn profits and not as capital.

March 9, 1891. The following judgments were read.

- G LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised by this appeal is how a portion of the surplus assets of this company, the Bridgewater Navigation Co., remaining after payment of all its debts and liabilities and paid-up capital ought to be divided between the ordinary and the preference shareholders.

- The company was formed in 1872 with a nominal capital of £500,000, divided into 500 shares of £1,000 each, which were afterwards altered into 50,000 shares of £10 each, and this capital was increased by the creation of 80,000 new shares of £10 each. In 1874 a special resolution was passed authorising the creation of preference shares, and in 1880 30,000 preference shares of £10 each were issued. The preference consisted of a preferential dividend of 5 per cent. In 1885 the Manchester Ship Canal Co. was authorised to buy the undertaking and working plant of the company for £1,710,000. In 1887 the Bridgewater Navigation Co. was wound-up voluntarily, with a view to the distribution of this purchase money and the ultimate dissolution of the company. Up to December, 1886, the accounts of the Navigation company were regularly made up on the footing that the company was a going concern. On Aug. 4, 1887, the company stopped business. The purchase made by the Manchester Ship Canal Co. has been carried out; the purchase money has been paid; the debts and liabilities of the Bridgewater Navigation Co. have been discharged; and the shareholders, both ordinary and preference, have been repaid their respective paid-up capitals; but there is still a surplus for division. The House of Lords has already decided that the whole of this surplus does not belong to the ordinary shareholders as profit, and that the surplus in question ought to be divided between both classes of shareholders in proportion to their shares. There still, however, remains for determination two questions, viz.: (i) whether certain reserve funds are to be treated as undrawn profits, and ought to be divided among the ordinary shareholders exclusively, or whether these reserve funds are to be treated as assets divisible among both classes of shareholders; and (ii) whether, in ascertaining the profits for the period between Dec. 31, 1886, and Aug. 4, 1887, the outstanding debts due to or from the company, and the company's plant and machinery, are to be estimated below their real value, as they always are when the company is a going concern, or whether these debts, etc., are to be taken at their actual ascertained amounts and value.

"after adjusting the rights of the shareholders inter se (other than their rights in respect of the purchase money)"

The first matter for determination is, whether the decision of the House of Lords has or has not settled the questions now raised. Certainly they were not pointedly before the House; the controversy in the litigation set at rest by the House of Lords related to a totally different matter, and although there is some little ambiguity in the wording of the formal order of the House, I agree with NORTH, J., that the questions which have now arisen have not yet been decided.

There were three reserve funds of the company—depreciation of steamers, £30,000; an insurance fund, £10,000; and a canal and river improvement fund, £3,500. None of these sums is actually set apart from the other assets of the company; they do not exist in the form of moneys carried to separate accounts and separately invested; the property representing them consists of the company's corporeal assets, and is mixed up with and not to be distinguished from other property of the same kind. On the other hand, it has been established beyond doubt that all these sums have been deducted from profits which the ordinary shareholders might have divided among themselves, but which it was considered judicious not to divide so long as the company was carrying on business. The sums in question are simply the undrawn profits of the ordinary shareholders.

With regard to the canal improvement fund and the insurance fund, there is really no controversy respecting either their origin or the purposes for which they were created, or their non-requirement for those purposes. With respect to the insurance fund, the truth is that the company did not insure at all. They set apart some of the divisible profits in order to meet contingencies which are generally provided for by effecting insurances, but that is all. The sums set apart for that purpose were and remained undrawn profits, and nothing else. With respect to the depreciation fund, the deposition of Mr. Collier (the accountant, secretary, and manager of the company) and the directors' reports and accounts establish that this fund originally consisted of undrawn profits, and that the value of the plant and machinery has been kept up out of revenue, and that this fund is not in fact required to make good any depreciation. The burden of showing this to be the case is, I think, on the ordinary shareholders; but, considering the evidence to which I have alluded, considering that Mr. Collier's evidence on this head is corroborated by several statements and entries showing that revenue was expended for purposes for which the depreciation fund might have been applied, considering that his evidence on this point has not been challenged by cross-examination and has not been met by any evidence to the contrary, I am of opinion that the truth of what I have above stated has been established.

It remains, however, to be considered whether these undrawn profits have been capitalised or so dealt with that they have become the property of both

A classes of shareholders instead of the property of the ordinary shareholders only. Carrying undrawn profits to a suspense account or to a reserve account does not necessarily change their character, still less their ownership; they remain the undrawn profits of those persons to whom they belonged, dedicated, no doubt, to certain purposes and applicable to those purposes, but not otherwise altered in their character or ownership. If the purposes for which such profits
B are set apart fail, or if the profits are not required for such purposes, they become divisible, not as capital, but as undrawn profits. When capital and profits belong to the same persons and in the same proportions, it becomes unimportant to distinguish the one from the other, and capitalisation for convenience may be inferred from slight evidence. But when capital and profits belong to different persons, or to the same persons in different proportions,
C the effect of capitalising profits is to change their ownership, and an intention to do this must be shown before conversion of profits into capital can be properly inferred. Moreover, this is a matter on which a majority cannot bind a minority unless expressly empowered to do so by the constitution of the company, either as originally framed or as subsequently modified by some authority binding on all. As a matter of law there can, I think, be no doubt on this point after
D the decision of the House of Lords in Bouch v. Sproule (1), particularly after what was said by LORD BRAMWELL.

As a matter of fact, this company has acted on this view, for in 1885 it divided among the ordinary shareholders £13,283 which had been previously standing to the credit of reserve funds, and part of this sum was taken from the depreciation fund. The moneys standing to the credit of the three reserve
E funds in question were not profits earned between December, 1886, and August, 1887; they were profits earned in previous years; but on the winding-up of the company the question to be determined is to whom such profits belong, not when they were earned. I cannot agree with NORTH, J., that there is any distinction between the three funds in question. He has given the canal improvement fund to the ordinary shareholders, but not the other two reserve funds.
F He appears to have considered that they were not profits, but sums which had to be taken into account before the profits could be ascertained. This, however, is a mistake. The company was under no obligation to insure or to create an insurance reserve fund, and if it did not choose to insure, and suffered no losses, the divisible profits would be increased. As regards the depreciation fund, if the company chose, as in fact it did, to keep up the value of its plant, etc., G and also to set apart some of its profits to meet unforeseen contingencies, such setting apart was not a necessary proceeding in order to ascertain the divisible profits, but they would have been larger by the amount carried over to the fund. The funds in question have not in fact ceased to be undrawn profits; they have not been capitalised or otherwise converted into assets to which the preference shareholders have any claim.

H I pass now to the second question. While the company was carrying on business the debts owing by it were over-estimated, the debts owing to it were underestimated, and the value of its plant and machinery was also underestimated. This was done from motives of prudence. The preference shareholders were not in any way prejudiced by it; they had their 5 per cent. The ordinary shareholders suffered by it, as, if the directors had been less cautious,
I the divisible profits would have been larger. But the necessity for this caution ceased when the company ceased to carry on business. There is no reason now for estimating anything; the actual value of everything is known; and the ordinary shareholders, therefore, contend that in taking the accounts from December, 1886, up to August, 1887, these items should be taken at their actual ascertained values, and not at estimated values as heretofore. NORTH, J., has decided this point against them on the ground, as I understand it, that the difference between the estimated and actual values is not a profit of the period in question. But granting this to be so, nevertheless the profits of the whole trading, less 5 per cent. on the preference shares, belong to the ordinary shareholders, and unless the actual values of the assets and liabilities are taken the result will be to give to the preference shareholders some portion of the profits which belongs to the ordinary shareholders. The difference between the estimated and ascertained values really represents undrawn profits, and the only question is whether the ordinary shareholders have lost their right to them. It was strongly urged that the court could not decide this point in favour of the ordinary shareholders without opening up the past accounts and disturbing the previous balance-sheets. But this is not true. No past account will be re-opened, no former balance-sheet will be disturbed.

The problem now to be solved has never yet arisen for solution. The problem is no longer what is to be done in the way of dividing the profits of a going concern; the problem now is how much of the whole assets of the company belongs to one class of shareholders, and how much to another; and if it appears that some of those assets consist of the undrawn profits of one of those classes, such undrawn profits ought to be distributed among the members of that class, unless some sufficient reason to the contrary can be shown, and in this case there is no such reason. I am, therefore, of opinion that the order appealed from must be varied by giving effect to the principles which I have endeavoured to explain. The costs of all parties ought to be treated as costs of the winding-up, and to come out of the funds to which both classes of shareholders are entitled. LOPES, L.J., desires me to say he concurs.

KAY, L.J.—The Bridgewater company were incorporated in 1872, and by their arts. 83 to 85, it was provided that no dividend should be paid except out of the profits arising from the business of the company as shown upon their balance-sheets; that the directors might set apart out of the profits reserve funds for various purposes and might invest the same and the interest of such investments should be dealt with as profits; and that, subject to this and to any arrangement for remunerating officers by commission, the entire net profits “of each year” should belong to the shareholders and be divided among them. The original capital of the company was 100,000 ten pound shares, on each of which £3 10s. was paid. Subsequently they issued 30,000 additional £10 shares, which were paid in full, and the holders of these shares were entitled to a preference dividend of 5 per cent., but had no preference as to capital. After payment of such preference dividends, all the remaining profits would be divisible among the ordinary shareholders.

On Aug. 6, 1887, the Bridgewater company sold their undertaking to the Manchester Ship Canal Co. under the powers of the Manchester Ship Canal Act, 1885, and on that day their business ceased. The sale was to take effect as upon Aug. 4, 1887. The price they obtained was much more than sufficient to repay all the paid-up capital. The preference shareholders have received their capital with a 5 per cent. dividend; the ordinary shareholders have received their capital and all the declared dividends, the last of which was at the rate of 8 per cent. upon an account made out to Dec. 31, 1886. There still remains a large part of the purchase money which has to be divided. The House of Lords decided in Birch v. Cropper, Re Bridgewater Navigation Co., Ltd. (2) that such part of this as is an accretion to capital ought to be divided among all the shareholders in proportion to the number of shares they hold, and not in proportion to the amounts paid up on those shares.

There were still some questions to be determined as between capital and income, and these were brought before NORTH, J., and now come before us by way of appeal from his decision. The first I will deal with relates to three funds set apart out of revenue under the power to which I have referred, viz.: (i) canal and river improvement fund; (ii) insurance fund to cover risks on the Mersey; and (iii) depreciation of steamers. Each of these funds had been set

A apart some years ago, and the amounts increased out of revenue from year to year; but in February, 1886, it appearing by the balance-sheet made out to Dec. 31, 1885, that capital was indebted to income in a sum of more than £30,000, the directors recommended that £13,282 6s. 6d., part of these reserved funds, which, in view of the sale of the undertaking to the Ship Canal company, they state was not required, should be distributed to the shareholders by way of
B bonus, and this was accordingly done by taking the whole of the first two mentioned reserved funds and £3,500 of the steamers depreciation fund. This transaction was authorised by a general meeting, and it proves conclusively that the shareholders did not consider that the act of reserving these funds had converted them from income into capital.

After this division, funds were again carried from revenue to each of these
C reserve accounts, and the dividend declared in 1887 upon the account made up to Dec. 31, 1886, was of course diminished by the amounts so reserved. NORTH, J., has held that the first reserve—the canal and river improvements—must be treated as income to which the ordinary shareholders are entitled. But as to the other two reserve funds he has come to a different conclusion. These he holds to be sums which have to be taken into account before you can
D say what the profits actually are. Taking the insurance fund as an illustration, the learned judge says that, in the ordinary course, premiums would have been paid out of income to an insurance company, but this company chose to be their own insurers. If a vessel were lost, so much of the property of the company would be gone; and, to prevent such diminution, the same sum (that is, I understand, the amount of the premiums) which would otherwise be payable
E is taken out of the profits and put into the general funds of the company. This, if I rightly follow it, is a decision that as premiums of insurance would ordinarily be payable, and the amount reserved represented such premiums, it was proper to deduct that amount in calculating the real profit. But this is in fact crediting this reserve fund to capital and treating it as such, which the company, by their division of the very reserve in 1886, have demonstrated that they did not
F intend. If there had been a loss, then to the extent of any such loss, the reserve fund might be treated as capital; but no loss in fact occurred. The capital was not diminished by any such accident, and the result is that this company did not in fact insure, but created an insurance fund, which was reserved out of income, in order to recoup any such accidental loss of capital as would ordinarily be insured against. But this fund was not wanted for that
G purpose, and, accordingly, not having lost its character as income, it seems to me that it should now be treated as those portions of the reserve fund which were not actually required were treated in 1886, and should be divided among the ordinary shareholders. Precisely the same considerations apply to both the other reserve funds. If they were not wanted for the purposes for which they were set apart, they are still income divisible among the ordinary share-
H holders. I agree with NORTH, J.'s view that this is so as to the canal improvement fund.

With respect to depreciation of steamers fund, there is a little more difficulty. If it could be shown that there was an actual depreciation by wear and tear, accidental injury, or the like, and that the steamers had not been kept up to
I their original value out of current revenue, then this depreciation fund might be applicable to make up that deficiency; and to the extent to which it was so applicable it might be proper to treat it as part of the capital. But the evidence of Mr. Collier, who was accountant, secretary, and manager of the Navigation company for many years, shows, I think, when fairly read, that the value of the steamers was in fact kept up, and that this reserve was made, not on account of any depreciation in fact, but to provide for the possibility of loss in case of the sale of the undertaking as a going concern, or the plant being brought under the hammer. His evidence is confirmed by Mr. Banner, the accountant, who, from an inspection of the books, states that the balance-sheets and accounts submitted to the shareholders from time to time had been prepared and presented on the footing of the plant and works of the company being fully and efficiently maintained in good order and repair out of current revenue. This is corroborated by Halliday, another accountant; and, upon looking through the balance-sheets and reports, I find continual mention of repairs and some purchases of steamers charged against revenue which seem to justify their statements. There is no counter-evidence on this point whatever, nor was there any cross-examination upon this subject. The result is that no depreciation has in fact occurred. The contingency which this fund was reserved to meet has not happened, and this fund must be treated as income divisible which, like all the others, has now been realised.

The remaining question for decision relates to the mode in which the account of profits should be taken for the interval between the last balance-sheet and Aug. 6, 1887, when the sale was completed. This was done in the former balance-sheets by first setting down all capital moneys received by shares, borrowings, or otherwise, and on the debtor side of this account were set down the various items of expenditure under the heads (i) "Cost of purchase, of navigations, land, building, etc.;" (ii) "New works;" (iii) "Plant, fixtures, etc." When the expenditure did not equal the receipts, the undertaking was indebted to capital in the amount of the balance, and this had to be deducted before the amount available for dividend could be ascertained. But by reason of large repayments of borrowed money in later years the balance was the other way. Capital had become indebted to revenue, and the amount to be credited to revenue on this account, according to the balance-sheet of Dec. 31, 1886, was £30,000. But this amount was arrived at not quite accurately. Although the other items of expenditure were literally set down, that for plant was made subject to a deduction of £2,298 for assumed depreciation, so that what was debited to the capital account was not its cost, but was an estimate of its value. This deduction of £2,298 reduced by the same amount the balance to be credited to revenue. By s. 22(2) of the Manchester Ship Canal Act, it was provided that the price thereby fixed was to include the working plant as shown and described in the stock account of 1884, and, if this exceeded or was less than its value, an equivalent compensation should be made on the one side or the other. No valuation has been required. The plant, therefore, should be taken at the figure in the stock book for 1884. If this was the same as or greater than the amount stated in the balance-sheet for 1886 without deducting the £2,298, it may be said that in effect since that balance-sheet the stock has been realised at the larger amount; and it is now claimed that the £2,298 deducted from revenue by way of precaution should be recouped by inserting in the account to be taken up to Aug. 6, 1887, the amount at which the plant has been taken over, and I think that this claim is well founded.

There are two other items—one the debts due from the company, the other the debts due to the company. The amount of the former is actually less than appears in the last balance-sheet; the latter are greater in amount. These two differences, it is claimed, should be treated as accretions to revenue up to Aug. 6, 1887. Suppose a debt due from the company had been set down at £6,000, but had been satisfied in the current year by a payment of £5,000, the difference, £1,000, would have been a benefit to revenue to that amount. So if a debt due to the company had been estimated as worth only £5,000, but £6,000 had been recovered, the additional £1,000 would also have increased the revenue of the period in which it was got in. In short, in making up this final balance-sheet it is no longer necessary or proper to put in estimates of the outstanding debts due to or from the company. The debts have been paid and realised respectively, and the actual amounts are known, and these amounts, whether less or greater than the last estimate, should come into the final account just as

A they would have done if the payment had been made in any year of the current business.

Husband and Wife—Summary proceedings—Desertion—Discontinuance of cohabitation under separation deed—Offer by wife to resume cohabitation refused by husband—Married Women (Maintenance in Case of Desertion) Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict., c. 52), s. 1.

E A husband and wife agreed to live apart under a separation deed by which the husband covenanted to pay seven shillings a week to a trustee for the wife. The husband ceased to make the payments under the deed, and shortly after the wife asked to be allowed to resume cohabitation with him. The husband refused, and the wife obtained an order from magistrates for the payment by the husband of seven shillings a week maintenance under s. 1 of the Married Women (Maintenance in Case of Desertion) Act, 1886.

F Held: to constitute desertion under the Act of 1886, the parties must have been living together as man and wife when desertion took place; accordingly, the husband's refusal to resume cohabitation did not amount to desertion within that Act, and the magistrates' order was wrong.

G Notes. The Married Women (Maintenance in Case of Desertion) Act, 1886, has been repealed. See now ss. 1 and 2 of the Matrimonial Proceedings (Magistrates' Courts) Act, 1960.

Appeal by the husband from a decision of the Divisional Court (DAY and LAWRENCE, JJ.), refusing to issue a mandamus to the justices to call on them to state a Case for the opinion of the court under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, s. 4, and the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of the court: The husband and wife agreed in 1890 to live apart, and a separation deed was executed reciting this agreement. The husband therein covenanted with the wife, and with a trustee in the usual way, that she might live apart, and that he would pay to the trustee 7s. a week for her separate use, and the trustee covenanted that she would not molest the husband. The husband after a time discontinued the payment of 7s. a week, and, on Jan. 12, 1891, an action was brought against him by the trustee for the arrears. He suffered judgment to go by default, but did not satisfy the judgment. A judgment summons was taken out, and the husband was ordered to pay the amount of the judgment by instalments. These instalments were not paid, and an order for commitment was made, execution of which was suspended for a time. On April 6, 1891, the wife went to the husband's house and asked to be allowed to resume cohabitation with him. He refused, and would not admit her into the house. On April 24, she took out a summons before the magistrates at Manchester, under s. 1 of the Married Women (Maintenance in Case of Desertion) Act, 1886, as "a married woman deserted by her husband," for maintenance. The magistrates ordered him to pay 7s. a week, and refused to state a Case for the opinion of the court under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, s. 4, and the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. The husband applied to the Divisional Court to grant a rule nisi calling on the magistrates to state a Case. The Divisional Court refused the rule on the ground that the question sought to be raised was not a question of law, but a question of fact, in respect of which the decision of the justices was final and conclusive. There was then an appeal from the refusal of the Divisional Court to grant a rule nisi to the Court of Appeal. That Court granted a rule nisi, which now came on for argument.

July 21, 1891. LOPES, L.J., read the following judgment of the court, in which he stated the facts, and continued: I am of opinion that, in this case, a question of law did arise in respect of which the magistrates should have stated a Case, and that the rule should be made absolute. To avoid the scandal, expense and delay which would arise in sending the matter back to the magistrates to state a Case, which would go to the Divisional Court, and perhaps cause an appeal to this court, counsel, at our suggestion, agreed to treat the facts which appeared in the affidavit of the magistrates as containing an accurate and sufficient statement of the facts, which should be regarded in all respects as if it were a Case Stated by the

A magistrates under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, s. 4, and the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

The question whether or not the wife has been deserted by the husband within the meaning of s. 1 of the Married Women (Maintenance in Case of Desertion) Act, 1886, is, as a general rule, a question of fact for the justices to determine. A husband deserts his wife if he wilfully absents himself from her society in spite of her wish. Desertion may be inferred from certain acts in one case which in another would not justify the same inference. There must be a deliberate purpose of abandoning the conjugal society. Such abandonment need not be for any specified period. If a husband had quite recently left his wife, stating that he did not intend to return, and was found living with another woman, there would be abundant evidence of desertion on which the justices could act. To constitute desertion the parties must be living together as man and wife when the desertion takes place. As was said in Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald (1), desertion implies an active withdrawal from a cohabitation that exists.

B This brings me to the case now before the court. The husband and wife at the date of the alleged desertion were living apart under a separation deed. Cohabitation had ceased by mutual consent. It was, therefore, impossible that the husband could desert his wife. So far, this case is governed by Pape v. Pape (2), with which decision I entirely agree. But it is said that, assuming that there was no desertion up to the time of the wife seeking to resume cohabitation, his refusal to again cohabit with his wife amounted to desertion or constructive desertion. It is clear that cohabitation was not resumed. The husband unequivocally refused to cohabit, and would not allow his wife to enter the house. What, then, is the effect of the wife's offer and wish to resume cohabitation, and the husband's refusal? Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald (1) answers this question. It is there said (L.R. 1 P. & D. at p. 698):

F "If the state of cohabitation has already ceased to exist whether by the adverse act of husband or wife, or even by the mutual consent of both, 'desertion' becomes from that moment impossible to either, at least until their common life and home have been resumed. In the meantime either party may have the right to call upon the other to resume their conjugal relations, and, if refused, to enforce their resumption; but such refusal cannot constitute the offence intended by the statute under the name of 'desertion without cause.'"

G I am of opinion, therefore, that the refusal of the husband to resume cohabitation did not amount to desertion within the statute in question. It follows, therefore, that the decision of the magistrates was wrong.

ALLCHURCH AND ANOTHER v. HENDON UNION ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.), July 9, 1891]

Rates—Assessment—Building occupied in parts—Separate occupation by tenants.

The appellants were tenants of a house, one having the exclusive occupation of the ground floor and the other having the exclusive occupation of the first floor. There was a staircase leading from the front door to the first floor, but the appellant occupying that floor usually used an external staircase leading into the back yard. The appellants jointly used the back yard and the water-closet in it. They were jointly assessed and rated as joint occupiers of the house, and the assessment was confirmed by the respondents. On appeal,

Held: as each of the appellants had the exclusive occupation of his part of the house, they were occupying separate tenements capable of being rated, and, therefore, they should be rated separately.

Notes. Considered: White and Hales v. Islington Corpn., [1909] 1 K.B. 133. Referred to: Crow v. Hilleary, [1913] 1 K.B. 385; Helman v. Horsham and Worthing Assessment Committee, [1949] 1 All E.R. 776.

As to the hereditament to be assessed for rates, see 32 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 81 et seq.; and for cases see 38 DIGEST (Repl.) 506 et seq.

Appeal by the respondents from the decision of the Queen's Bench Division (A. L. SMITH and GRANTHAM, JJ.), affirming on a Case Stated a decision of the Court of General Quarter Sessions for the county of Middlesex.

A rate for the relief of the poor for the parish of Hendon was made by the churchwardens and overseers of that parish on Dec. 7, 1889, in which the appellants were jointly assessed and rated as joint occupiers of a house and yard, No. 2, Belle Vue Road. The assessment was duly confirmed by the respondents. The appellants appealed to the General Quarter Sessions of the county of Middlesex, against the rate on (among others) the following grounds: First, that they were rated in respect of property of which they were not occupiers, and from which they derived no benefit; secondly, that they were jointly rated in respect of property which they did not occupy jointly, and in which they had no joint interest or benefit; thirdly, that the same rate was made on each of them in respect of the whole of the premises, whereas they each occupied a distinct portion thereof as a separate tenement only, and were liable, if at all, to be rated separately in respect of such separate tenement only; fourthly, that the rate was made on them jointly in respect of the whole of the premises, whereas they each respectively occupied only a distinct portion thereof as a separate tenement, and they did not occupy the premises nor any part of thereof jointly, and they were not liable to be rated jointly, and were liable, if at all, to be rated and assessed separately in respect of such separate tenements only.

The house contained nine rooms, four being on the ground floor and five on the first floor. The front door opened into a passage which communicates with the ground floor rooms, and also, by means of an internal staircase, with the first floor rooms. There was a small garden in front of the house, and behind the house a yard in which was the only water-closet. The back yard and water-closet were reached from the ground floor by a door which opened into one of the ground floor rooms, and from the first floor by a door which opened into one of the first floor rooms, and from which there was a staircase. It was usual for the occupier of the upper floor to reach the street from the back yard without passing through the house. The house was supplied with water from one cistern, which served both tenants, who could each draw water in his own kitchen independently of the other.

A The rooms on the ground floor all opened on to the passage, and the rooms on the first floor on to the landing at the top of the staircase. Except by the staircase, there was no internal access between the upper and lower floors. The house was let to the appellants, each being a weekly tenant paying 5s. 6d. a week rent, and each had a separate letting, rent-book and key. By arrangement between the tenants and the landlord, the latter paid all tenants' rates and taxes. The appellant B Parrott had the exclusive use and occupation of the rooms on the ground floor, and the appellant Allchurch had the exclusive use and occupation of the rooms on the first floor. The back yard and water-closet were jointly used. By arrangement between the appellants, the wife of Allchurch cleaned the internal staircase, and the wife of Parrott the passage on the ground floor. There was no bell to the front door, and, by a mutual understanding, one knock on the door was answered by C Parrott or one of his family, and two knocks by Allchurch or one of his family. The tenant of the ground floor had never been in the first floor rooms, nor had the tenant of the first floor himself ever used the inside staircase. The wife and children of the first floor tenant usually used the back entrance by the outside staircase, but a person calling on either tenant came to the front door, and letters for both were delivered there. The landlord did not reside in the house, nor retain D any control or dominion over it, nor render any services to the tenants. The tenant of the ground floor had the only key of the front door. The tenant of the upper floor had the only key of the door leading to the separate staircase. The furniture in and on the respective floors belonged to the respective tenants thereof. There was no division of the yard at the back. It was necessary to get into the yard in order to reach the water-closet, which was used by both tenants, and cleaned by E them alternately. Each tenant kept his coals in bins on his own floor.

The appellants contended that each tenant was the sole and exclusive occupier of a separate tenement or hereditament capable of being rated, and each tenant should have been separately rated in respect of the part of the house occupied by him as a separate dwelling, and that the rate was, therefore, bad. The respondents F contended that the appellants were rightly jointly rated as joint occupiers of the house. The court of quarter sessions decided in favour of the appellants, and ordered that the rate so far as it affected the appellants be quashed, subject to this Case Stated.

G LORD ESHER, M.R.—The argument in this case is made to depend on this, that, because there was no structural division in the house, the occupation of each part of it is to be treated as if there was a joint occupation by the people who in fact occupy separate portions. The phrase "structural severance" has nothing to do at all with occupation. It was invented at a time when the judges were labouring, under the Statute of Elizabeth and the Franchise Acts, to determine H what was an occupation which would give a liability to be rated, and what would give the right to the franchise. That phrase was in use for a long time, so much so that the legislature had to deal with it, and in fact has had to do away with it, so that, in dealing with occupation as a foundation for any right or liability, the phrase is got rid of, and it is necessary to look at the occupation and see what it is I that is occupied.

The question now is: what is the occupation here, because the occupier is the person to be rated. What do each of the appellants here occupy? One occupies the rooms on the ground floor of the house, and that is a separate occupation because nobody else has any right to interfere with it. The other occupies another portion of the house, and his occupation is a separate one and no one can interfere with it. Therefore, each one is a separate occupier of a part of the house, and they are each to be rated in respect of his occupation. Neither of them can be rated as an occupier of any part of the house with which he has nothing to do, as to which he has no right at all, and which he cannot even enter on without trespassing. A

The occupation of each is clearly separate. It would be a misuse of words, it would be untrue, to say that each occupies the whole house. As to the staircase, if both appellants have the right of using it, it seems to me that neither of them is in possession of it, but only the landlord. The landlord has given to each appellant the right of occupying some parts of the house, and he has not given them the right to occupy the whole house jointly. R

The question is merely one of occupation, and you must find out what it is that each appellant occupies. You find that each appellant occupies a something which, whatever it be, is a thing in respect of the occupation of which he is liable to be rated. If his occupation is a separate one, he is separately occupying something in respect of which he is liable to be rated, and he, in respect of that separate occupation, must be the only person. So that the proper way of rating the appellants was C to rate each of them in respect of that separate part of the house, or whatever it is, which he separately occupies; the thing which he occupies being something which makes the person who occupies it liable for rates. The judgment of the Divisional Court is, therefore, right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

But it is said that this will give trouble to overseers. Perhaps so; but they must take the trouble of rating people according to their true liability. They must not D only look at the outside of a house, they must go in and inquire how it is occupied.
The whole matter of structural separation is an exploded phrase and an exploded doctrine for all purposes whatever, and the phrase should never again be used.
BOWEN, L.J., has just left the court, but he heard the whole of the argument, and he agrees with the reasons which I have given in my judgment, and with all that I have said. E

KAY, L.J.—I agree, and I must say that I am glad that the conclusion seems to be inevitable, because any other would be productive of great injustice. To make the occupier of the ground floor liable for the rates of the first floor, on which he cannot go without trespassing, would be a very great injustice. In the same way, to make the occupier of the first floor liable for the rates of the ground floor, into F no part of which he can go except possibly the staircase which leads to the outer door, would be equally unjust. That they have a common use of the staircase cannot make each occupier occupy jointly with the other the other man's part of the house. I entirely agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said. The appeal must be dismissed.

Shipping—Collision—Damages—General average—Jettison of cargo.

In a collision between a Dutch steamship and an English steamship the former was sunk, and, in order to reach a port of safety, the latter had to jettison part of her cargo. The owners of the Dutch ship brought a collision action against the owners of the English ship, who counterclaimed, and the Dutch ship was found alone to blame. On the reference as to damages, the owner of the English ship claimed the balance due in general average from ship to cargo, the amount due from cargo to ship having been deducted.

Held: since it was the relation between ship and cargo out of which the obligation to make general average contribution arose and not the antecedent collision that was the immediate cause of the loss to either ship or cargo by reason of the necessity of making such contribution, the claim must be disallowed.

Petition by the defendants in objection to the registrar's report in a collision action in personam.

On June 25, 1890, a collision occurred between the plaintiffs' steamship the Prinz Frederik and the defendants' steamship the Marpessa. The Prinz Frederik was sunk. Subsequently to the collision the Marpessa, in order to enable her to reach a port of safety, was obliged to jettison part of her gear and cargo. This loss of cargo and the damage to the Marpessa formed the subject of general average. A provisional adjustment was made by which £722 19s. 4d. was found due from the ship to the cargo, and £408 1s. 7d. from the cargo to the ship, the result being a balance of £314 17s. 9d. due from the ship to cargo. The Marpessa's cargo was carried under bills of lading which relieved the shipowners from liability for the loss of and damage to the cargo. An action was brought by the plaintiffs, who were a Dutch company, and the defendants counterclaimed and obtained bail under s. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861. The owners of cargo on the Marpessa were not parties to the action. The Prinz Frederik was found alone to blame both by the Admiralty Court and the Court of Appeal, and the amount of the defendants' damages was referred to the registrar and merchants for assessment. At the reference, the defendants originally claimed, inter alia, an item of £884 18s. 11d., the value of the jettisoned cargo, but subsequently amended their claim by substituting for the £884 18s. 11d. an item of £722 19s. 4d., being the ship's contribution in general average to the cargo. The registrar disallowed this item, and the defendants appealed from that decision, claiming to be allowed either £722 19s. 4d., or in the alternative the sum of £314 17s. 9d., being the balance due from ship to cargo.

Barnes, Q.C., and Pyke for the defendants.

Myburgh, Q.C., and J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.

Aug. 11, 1891. JEUNE, J., stated the facts, and continued: The question is whether, in estimating the damages due to the Marpessa, the sum of £314 17s. 9d. is to be included. The argument for the claim is very simple. It is said that the general average loss was caused by the collision, and, therefore, that the wrong-doing ship is liable to make good the sum which the Marpessa had to pay by way of general average contribution. It is admitted that there is no precedent of any such claim ever having been allowed. It is hardly suggested that such a claim has ever been made. It is said that it is made in the present instance because, the wrong-doing ship having been sunk, the cargo-owners can bring no action against the owners in their country, as the law of the country does not permit it, and it is said that they are not likely to be able to sue the owners in this country. It is not probably, however, the first time that such a set of circumstances has arisen, and, even if it were, the principle contended for is one of general application; nor, it is to be observed, was the present claim that first put forward in this proceeding. Originally the claim was for the total value of the cargo jettisoned, then an amendment was asked for to allow the £722 19s. 4d. to be claimed, as being the total sum due from ship to cargo. Before me, the claim was limited to the sum of £314 17s. 9d., being the amount due from ship to cargo on the balance of account between them.

The answer to the claim put forward appears to me to be not, as was suggested, that loss by collision is an exception in the bill of lading, because the bill of lading is not concerned with liabilities to contribution in general average: Schmidt v. Royal Mail Steamship Co. (1); nor, as was also suggested, that the court would be compelled in this and in all similar cases to determine the amount of the general average contribution, because the court is compelled to do this if the matter incidentally arise in a case properly before it: The Daring (2); but that the loss sustained by the ship, by having to make the general average contribution in question, was not caused by the collision, though of course it would not have occurred had not the collision happened. Whether the rule that loss by general average must be borne proportionately by those interested arises from an implied

A contract to contribute inter se, as was suggested by BRAMWELL, L.J., in Wright v. Marwood (3) (7 Q.B.D. at p. 67), or whether, as SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., held in Burton v. English (4) (12 Q.B.D. at pp. 220, 221),

"it does not arise from any contract at all, but from the old Rhodian laws, and has become incorporated into the law of England as the law of the ocean,"

B or whether, as BOWEN, L.J., said in the same case (ibid. at p. 223),

"In the investigation of legal principles the question whether they arise by way of implied contract or not often ends by being a mere question of words," it seems to me clear that it is the relation between ship and cargo out of which the obligation to make general average contribution arises, and not the antecedent collision that is the immediate cause of the loss to either ship or cargo by reason of the necessity of making such contribution. It is an instance of the old distinction between causa causans and causa sine qua non.

C One consideration in particular appears to me to support this view. In this case, the balance of contribution as between owners of ship and owners of cargo was against the owners of ship; but the balance might have been the other way, and there must always be a balance of contribution in favour either of ship or of cargo.

D where the general average loss extends to both. I put, therefore, to senior counsel for the defendants what appeared to me to be a crucial question, viz., if the balance on general average contribution had been due to the ship from the cargo, would it be reckoned in diminution of the damages? Counsel, I think, preferred to say that it would. If so, it appears to me that a principle similar to that on which it has been held that the benefit of an insurance cannot be claimed by a wrong-doer

E (Bradburn v. Great Western Rail. Co. (5) and Jebsen v. East and West India Dock Co. (6)) is fatal to his contention. Junior counsel for the defendants, on the other hand, said unhesitatingly that such balance could not be brought in to lessen the damages, that the ship could recover the full actual loss to it, that the cargo could recover the full actual loss to it, and that, besides, one or other could recover the amount of the payment which on the balance of account one or other must, in

F almost every case, have to make, and he did not shrink from the conclusion that the wrong-doer must thus in almost every case of the kind pay more than the total amount of the actual damage caused. I cannot think that that is the law; indeed, if it be, it is unaccountable that shipowners and cargo-owners have, since the institution of the Admiralty Court, neglected so obvious a method of profiting by collision. I must, therefore, decide against the present claim.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Kekewich, J.), February 6, 1891]

39 W.R. 315]Specific Performance—Sale of land—Purchaser in possession—Acceptance of title—Option to give up possession or to pay purchase-money into court.

The defendant, while in possession of property under an underlease from S. expiring on June 24, 1890, on Aug. 22, 1889, contracted to purchase the property from S.'s lessors (the plaintiffs), accepted the title, and paid a deposit. The day fixed for completion by the contract was the date of the expiration of the lease, and the defendant was to pay interest on the purchase-money in default of completion. The defendant, although he remained in possession, refused to complete or to pay the balance of the purchase-money. He claimed to be in possession under the sublease and not under the contract, and offered to pay rent at the rate reserved by his lease or to bring the amount into court. The plaintiffs brought an action for specific performance, and moved for a four-day order on the defendant to pay the balance of the purchase-money and interest into court.

Held: the defendant must have the option of retiring from possession or of paying the balance of the purchase-money into court within one month from the date of the hearing of the motion, and, therefore, the motion failed.

Motion.

By an agreement in writing, dated Aug. 22, 1889, and made between the plaintiffs, Henry Charles Greenwood and John Charles McMullen, trustees of the will of Mary Ann McMullen deceased, of the one part, and the defendant, Thomas Turner, of the other part, and duly signed by the defendant, the plaintiffs agreed to sell and the defendant agreed to purchase a freehold messuage called Elm House, Lavender Hill, Surrey, with its outbuildings, gardens and appurtenances, and the fee simple and inheritance thereof, for £5,000, subject to a sub-

A sisting lease of the premises to one Frederick William Steward for the term of fourteen years from June 24, 1876, at the annual rent of £185. By the terms of the agreement, the sum of £4,750 (being the amount of the purchase-money over and above a deposit of £250 which was paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs on or before the execution of the agreement) was to be paid on June 24, 1890, and on payment thereof, a proper assurance of the purchased premises was to be executed to the defendant; and it was provided that if, from any cause whatever, the purchase should not be completed on June 24, 1890, the defendant should pay interest on the unpaid purchase-money at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from that day until completion. The plaintiffs deduced a good title to the hereditaments, and they alleged that the defendant had, long before June 24, 1890, accepted their title, and that, after the defendant accepted the plaintiffs' title, the plaintiffs by their solicitor pressed the defendant to forward the draft of the conveyance in pursuance of the agreement, but that he had never done so. The defendant had not paid his unpaid purchase money of £4,750, or any part thereof, or any interest thereon, and he refused to complete his purchase, or to pay the unpaid purchase-money, notwithstanding many requests by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendant claiming specific performance by the defendant of the agreement, and payment by the defendant of the unpaid purchase-money of £4,750 and the interest thereon; also damages and costs. A motion was now made on behalf of the plaintiffs that the defendant, having accepted the title to the hereditaments the subject of the action, and being in possession thereof, might be ordered within four days after service of the order to be made on the motion to lodge in court to the credit of the action the sum of £4,750, being the unpaid balance of his purchase-money for the premises, together with interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from June 24th, 1890, to the date of payment, the amount thereof to be verified by affidavit, or that such further or other order might be made with reference to the defendant's occupation of the premises as to the court should seem meet. According to the evidence filed in support of the motion, at the date of the contract of Aug. 22, 1889, of which specific performance was claimed in the action, the defendant was in occupation of Elm House as under-lessee of Frederick William Steward, and which, therefore, was to expire, and did expire, on June 24, 1890. Ever since the last-mentioned date the defendant had been, and still was, in actual possession of the premises; no part of the purchase money of the premises beyond the deposit of £250 mentioned in the contract for sale had been paid; and the defendant had not paid any rent in respect of his occupation of the premises since June 24, 1890, nor any interest on his purchase-money, and no arrangement had been made or proposed by him with reference to his occupation thereof. The defendant filed an affidavit in opposition to the motion in which he stated that he was tenant of Elm House under a lease thereof dated June 15, 1882, and made between Frederick William Steward of the one part and himself of the other part, whereby Elm House was granted to him for a term expiring on June 24, 1890, at an annual rent of £160, and that he had continued to remain in possession on the expiration of such lease, but not under the agreement for sale and purchase. The defendant also stated that he was ready and willing to pay rent at the rate aforesaid from June 24, 1890, to Frederick William Steward or the person entitled thereto, or to bring the amount thereof into court without prejudice to the defence raised in the action.

KEKEWICH, J.—I feel strongly tempted to make this order, because I cannot help thinking that the purchaser has retained possession as long as he could, and but for this action, would have retained it still; that is to say, he is endeavouring as far as possible to have the benefit of the contract and yet retain the purchase-money. If I could find any authority to that effect I should act on it with great readiness. But my recollection of the practice of the court and the cases combine to prevent me from making the order. If I did so I should be establishing a new rule. In Lewis v. James (1), COTTON, L.J., states the rule, which is well known, and I only take it from that case because it expresses the rule in plain words and in better language than I could frame. He says (32 Ch.D. at p. 330):

"This is in some respects like a case where a purchaser being in possession is required to pay into court, if he remain in possession, the purchase-money agreed upon, but it is well known that in such a case under ordinary circumstances an option is given to the purchaser to go out, and the order only is that if he continue in possession he must pay the price into court."

His Lordship then refers to two cases, Cutler v. Simons (2) and Pope v. Great Eastern Rail. Co. (3), the latter illustrating a large class of cases where the purchaser remains in possession and is doing something which is inconsistent with the property remaining intact or with restoring it in its original state, and the court on that ground orders payment into court. The lord justice refers to the principle of those cases as being what I have already stated, and he does not refer to any other exception from the ordinary rule. I turn to the other cases which have been referred to, and in all of them I find that the purchaser has had the option of retiring from possession.

It is said that, in all these cases, there was an objection to the title. There was an objection in Clarke v. Wilson (4) and in Tindal v. Cobham (5); and in Gibson v. Clarke (6) there were very special circumstances, for the purchaser had been let into possession in the confidence that a good title would be made out, and the confidence was not made good. LORD ELDON said that he must pay the money or restore the land; and the order, made by agreement, was that the purchaser should restore possession, accounting for the rents, without prejudice to any question between the parties. I find no rule, nor anything approaching to a rule, that, where a purchaser has taken and remains in possession, although the possession was under the contract, he is bound to pay the money into court, unless under such circumstances as I have mentioned. If I were to hold that he had no option, I think that I should be extending the rule. I therefore, refuse to make an order for payment into court. The defendant must have the option of retiring from possession.

Warmington, Q.C., asked for interest on the purchase-money according to the terms of the contract.

Theobald argued that that would be inconsistent with the option allowed to the defendant, and that at all events such an order ought not to be made on the motion.

KEKEWICH, J.—Such an order was made in Tindal v. Cobham (5) and in Gibson v. Clarke (6). The defendant is claiming to have the benefit of six months' possession for nothing. The order will be that the defendant elect either to pay the purchase-money into court by Mar. 6, i.e., within one month, or to give up possession on that day. If he gives up possession, then he must pay to the plaintiffs interest at 4 per cent. on the purchase-money from June 24, 1890, to March 6, 1891.

Trust—Protective trust—Forfeiture of protected life interest—Making of receiving order.

The income of property had been given by will to a debtor for life or until he should assign, charge, or otherwise dispose of the income or some part thereof, or become bankrupt, "or do or suffer something whereby the said income, if belonging to him absolutely, or some part thereof, would become payable to or vested in some other person." A receiving order had been made against the debtor but no further bankruptcy proceedings, except a meeting of creditors, had been taken. The trustees had retained all the income accrued due since the receiving order, claiming that the protected interest had determined.

Held: although an order appointing a receiver did not vest the debtor's estate in the receiver and the debtor was still the proper person to sue for the income, nevertheless the order had the effect of an injunction preventing the debtor from receiving it; accordingly, the income was no longer "payable" to the debtor; and the protected interest had determined.

Appeal by the debtor, A. C. F. Sartoris, from a decision of CHITTY, J. (64 L.T. 730) holding that he had forfeited his protected life interest under the will of his father, E. J. Sartoris.

E. J. Sartoris, by his will dated July 19, 1887, appointed his brother A. Sartoris and O. Green executors thereof, and devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate, not otherwise disposed of, unto the plaintiffs H. Sartoris and H. E. Gordon, upon trust for sale and conversion, and for investment of the proceeds as therein directed, and it was declared that the plaintiffs should stand possessed of the residuary trust moneys, and the stocks, funds, shares, and securities in or upon which the same should from time to time be invested (thereinafter called "the residuary trust funds"), upon trust to pay the income of the residuary trust funds to the testator's son, the defendant Algernon Charles Frederick Sartoris, during his life or until he should

"assign, charge, or otherwise dispose of the said income, or some part thereof, or become bankrupt, or do or suffer something whereby the said income, if belonging absolutely to him, or some part thereof, would become payable to or vested in some other person (which of the said events should first happen);"

and if the trust thereinbefore declared should determine in the lifetime of A. C. F. Sartoris then in trust during the remainder of the life of A. C. F. Sartoris to pay and apply the income thereof for the maintenance and support or otherwise for the benefit of all or such one or more exclusively of the other or others of A. C. F. Sartoris and his wife and issue for the time being in such manner in all respects as the trustees of the will should in their uncontrolled discretion think fit.

The testator died on Nov. 23, 1888, and his will was duly proved on Jan. 23, 1889. The total income of the testator's residuary trusts funds was approximately £6,000 per annum. The wife of the defendant A. C. F. Sartoris, by whom he had three children then living, survived the testator, and was living at the date of the present proceedings.

On a petition filed Oct. 28, 1890, a receiving order in bankruptcy against the defendant A. C. F. Sartoris was made by the Hampshire County Court, holden at Southampton, on Nov. 28, 1890. The first meeting of creditors of A. C. F. Sartoris was held on Dec. 29, 1890, and adjourned till Jan. 26, 1891, and was again adjourned pending the present proceedings. A. C. F. Sartoris had not been adjudicated bankrupt. At the date of the receiving order no income of the testator's residuary estate was in the hands of the plaintiffs available for payment in accordance with the trusts of the will, but income had since accrued due therefrom, and had been paid to them.

An originating summons was taken out by the plaintiffs, to which A. C. F. Sartoris, his wife, their three infant children, and the official receiver in bankruptcy of the Hampshire County Court were defendants, asking how the plaintiffs were to deal with the accruing income of the residuary trust funds, this point depending upon the question of law, whether, by reason of a receiving order being made, any one of the events specified in the will had happened whereby the estate of A. C. F. Sartoris had become determined. The summons was heard before CHITTY, J., on June 9, 1891, when his Lordship decided that since the receiving order the income was no longer "payable to" A. C. F. Sartoris; and that his life interest had consequently determined (64 L.T. 730). From that decision A. C. F. Sartoris now appealed.

Sidney Woolf, Q.C., and R. Ringwood for A. C. F. Sartoris.

C. A. James for the trustees of the will.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case we have to consider the effect of a clause in a will. By his will, the testator devised and bequeathed certain property to trustees, and by the clause in question directs the trustees to pay the income to his son A. C. F. Sartoris

"during his life or until he shall assign, charge, or otherwise dispose of the said income, or some part thereof, or become bankrupt, or do or suffer something whereby the said income, if belonging to him absolutely, or

A some part thereof, would become payable to or vested in some other person (which of the said events shall first happen)."

What has happened is this. A. C. F. Sartoris did not assign, charge, or otherwise dispose of the income, or any part of it, nor did he become bankrupt; but the question is whether he has done or suffered anything whereby the income, if belonging to him absolutely, would have become payable to some other person. A receiving order in bankruptcy was made against him in November, 1890, and a meeting of creditors was held, but nothing further has been done. He has not been adjudged a bankrupt, and no trustee has been appointed, but the receiving order still subsists.

B The question is whether, having regard to the receiving order, the income is still payable to the debtor. The material sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, are ss. 9, 54, and 70. Section 9 states the effect of a receiving order, and provides that an official receiver shall be thereby constituted receiver of the property of the debtor. Section 54 makes the property of the debtor vest in the official receiver on the debtor being adjudged bankrupt. Section 70 (1) enacts that it shall be the duty of the official receiver, "pending the appointment of a trustee, to act as interim receiver of the debtor's estate." Section 70 (2) is important.

D It says that,

"for the purpose of his duties as interim receiver or manager, the official receiver shall have the same powers as if he were a receiver and manager appointed by the High Court."

E We are asked to say that, notwithstanding the appointment of the receiver for the purpose of receiving the debtor's property, the income is still payable to the debtor, because the receiver cannot sue for it, and the debtor is still the proper person to sue. The debtor's estate, it is true, does not vest in the receiver, and the distinction between the position of an official receiver and that of a trustee in bankruptcy was pointed out at some length in Rhodes v. Dawson (1). But it does not follow that, because it was there held that the liquidating debtor is the proper person to sue for the income, the order for the appointment of a receiver means nothing at all. The duty of the receiver is to receive the debtor's estate, and it must be remembered that an order of the High Court appointing a receiver has the effect of an injunction, and prevents the person against whom the order is made from receiving the money which the receiver was appointed to receive. The fallacy of the argument of A. C. F. Sartoris is in supposing that, because the estate has not vested in the official receiver, and the debtor is the proper person to sue for it, the debtor is still the person entitled to receive the income.

G It is an entire misapprehension to suppose that the order appointing the receiver means nothing at all, and that, after it is made, it is still the right of the debtor to receive his assets. With regard to Re James, Clutterbuck v. James (2), that was evidently decided by KEKEWICH, J., on the assumption that under the Scottish law no person was in fact appointed to receive. The decision of CHITTY, J., is quite right and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

I FRY, L.J.—I agree.

*Will—Debt owing to testator—Debts owing from specific devisees and legatees—
Other debts owing from beneficiaries entitled to share of residue—Debts statute-barred.*

A testator made various specific devises and bequests and directed that the proceeds of the sale of his residuary estate (which consisted of realty and personalty) should be divided in stated proportions. It was alleged that some of the specific devisees and legatees and some of the residuary beneficiaries owed debts to the testator which (if they were owing), were statute-barred at his death.

Held: (i) the specific devisees and legatees were each entitled to take the property specifically given without first making good what, if anything, they owed to the testator's estate; and (ii) the residuary beneficiaries, on the other hand, had to bring into account any money they owed the estate with interest at 4 per cent. from the date of death on the principle that a person who owes money to an estate, and who is, therefore, bound to increase the general mass of the estate by a contribution of his own, cannot claim an aliquot share given to him out of that mass unless he first makes the contribution which completes it.

Per Curiam: In this respect, a pecuniary legatee is in a different position from a specific legatee.

B Adjourned Summons taken out by Henry Akerman, asking that it might be determined whether the applicant and the other sons of the testator, or any or which of them, ought to be charged with any and what sums lent by the testator to them respectively; and whether they ought to bring into account as against their respective shares of the testator's residuary real and personal estate, or of any specific property by the said will given to them, any and what sums due from them respectively to the testator at the date of his death.

- C Henry Akerman, by his will dated Oct. 28, 1886, appointed his wife and his son James his trustees and executors, and after making various bequests and devises (including specific devises of freeholds to his sons William, Henry, James, and George and a bequest of certain leaseholds to his son William), devised a farm and lands in the county of Bucks to his trustees upon trust to let, sell, or lease the same, and in the event of the same being let to pay the income to his children (other than his daughter Eliza) in equal shares, and in the event of a sale to pay and apply the net proceeds to or for the benefit of his seven children in the same manner as was directed with respect to the shares of his children in his residuary real and personal estate. The testator devised and bequeathed all his residuary real and personal estate to his trustees upon trust to sell and convert the same into money and out of the proceeds to pay the testator's debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the pecuniary legacies, and to hold the net proceeds as to three-sevenths thereof upon certain trusts for his son Edward and his two daughters and their issue, and to pay the remaining four-sevenths to the testator's sons Henry, William, James, and George in equal shares as tenants in common. The testator made two codicils to his will, which are not material to this report, and by a third codicil, dated Oct. 26, 1889, after reciting that he had sold his farm and lands in Bucks for £4,000, bequeathed £2,000 part thereof to his wife and directed the remaining £2,000 to remain as part of his residuary estate. The residuary estate of the testator consisted principally of certain building land and the said sum of £2,000.

- F The testator died on June 23, 1890. At the time of his death the testator held acknowledgments or promissory notes respectively signed by his four sons James, Henry, William, and Edward, for various sums advanced to them. These advances were made considerably more than six years previously to the date of the testator's death, and the debts were accordingly barred by the Statute of Limitations. The question was also raised whether the testator had not by his conduct released the debts created by these advances, and whether any sums were in fact due from his sons to the estate, and an inquiry was directed to ascertain the facts. By two agreements, dated Mar. 18, 1889, and Nov. 27, 1889, made between the testator and his son George, the latter admitted his indebtedness to the testator in various amounts. Edward was adjudicated bankrupt on Sept. 17, 1869, and obtained his discharge on Jan. 1, 1870; the advances made to him by the testator were anterior to the date of his bankruptcy.

KEKEWICH, J.—The questions which have been argued in this case directly affect the testator's three sons, Henry, William, and James. They also affect the fourth son George, but indirectly, because if Henry, William, and James, or any one or more of them, have to contribute to the testator's estate by reason of being indebted thereto, George would have a larger fund out of which he would take his share. These questions do not affect Edward, who is also mentioned in the will; he became bankrupt before the death of the testator, and no one has attempted to argue that his debt, which it is admitted then existed, was subsisting at the time of the testator's death. I may, therefore, leave George and Edward out of consideration. A

The other sons, Henry, William, and James, all take specific devises or legacies, and it has been suggested rather than argued that they cannot take the properties specifically given to them without first making good what they owe to the testator's estate—that is, that there should be a deduction in each case from the specific devise or legacy of the amount which is due to the estate from the devisee or legatee. No authority has been cited for this suggestion, and it seems to me contrary to all authority. B

A specific legacy is a thing to be taken apart and given to the legatee; it is to be extracted from the estate before the residue can be ascertained. On the other hand, a debt is part of the residue; it has to be paid, so far as it can be recovered, in order that the residue may be constituted. The distinction is clear between pecuniary and specific legacies in reference to such a debt. C

As regards the residuary estate, apart from the argument that there is no debt at all due to the estate from the testator's sons, it is not contended that a debtor to the testator's estate must not make good his debt before he takes his share of the residue; and if the case fell within the ordinary rule that a debtor cannot claim a part of the residue without making good what he owes to that residue, there would be no difficulty in dealing with this case. D

The difficulty is that here there is included in the residue not only ordinary personal estate but also real estate. There is a general gift of the residuary real and personal estate to the trustees of the testator, who in this case are the same persons as the executors of the will, in trust to sell and convert the property into money, and out of the proceeds of sale to pay the testator's debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and the pecuniary legacies, and then to divide the residue among the children of the testator in the shares indicated. E
In other words, it is strictly residue which is to be divided; it is what remains of the property after satisfying specific legacies, and that is to be dealt with as residue should be dealt with, namely, in the payment of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and pecuniary legacies, and the ultimate residue is to be divided in that character. The argument is that though as against the executors and as against the personal estate what is due must be brought in so as to constitute residue, yet as against the proceeds of real estate that rule does not apply. No case has been produced in which the general rule has been held to apply to such a case, perhaps for the reason hinted at by BACON, V.-C., in Re Cordwell's Estate, White v. Cordwell (1). I think that I must decide this case on general principles. F

LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., in Cherry v. Boulton (2), remarked that the word "set-off" is very inaccurately used in a case of this kind. I would venture to add to that remark that the term "retainer" is also inaccurately used in cases of this kind. Neither of these words can properly be used, and both produce confusion. The principle which is applicable will be found laid down in Cherry v. Boulton (2), and also in Courtenay v. Williams (3), and it is that a person who owes an estate money—that is, who is bound to increase the general mass to be distributed by the contribution of the amount due from him—cannot claim an aliquot share of the mass without bringing in the contribution which completes it. Nothing is retained by the representatives of the testator, and nothing is strictly set off. The contributor is paid by holding in his own hand a part of the mass, which, if the mass had been first completed, he would be able to recover back. That is a right on his part to pay himself out of the fund in his hands rather than a set-off. As WIGRAM, V.-C., says in Courtenay v. Williams (3) the legatee has assets of the testator in his hands, and must pay his legacy I

- A pro tanto out of those assets. Why should not that principle be applied to a case like this, where all the property is put together and all given to the same persons, upon the same trusts for payment of debts and division among the same persons? The contributor to the mass is in the same position whether the mass be held by trustees or executors; it would be introducing a mere technicality and preventing the proper application of a principle to say that
- B because the person to distribute the mass is a trustee and not an executor the contributor is to get off paying his debt, and is to have an aliquot share of the mass and also the amount which he should have contributed to it.

I am not deciding a case where there is a mere gift of real estate made directly to the legatee or through a trustee, and whether by means of a trust for sale or otherwise. I am here dealing with the case of a general fund made up of the

C proceeds of the sale of real estate and the conversion of personal estate, and the principle laid down in Courtenay v. Williams (3) seems to me to be directly in point. I, therefore, think that, if there is a debt payable by a residuary legatee under the circumstances in this case, that debt, for the purposes of computation, must be included in the residue and treated as part of the share of residue going to the legatee debtor.

- D Then I am asked to decide that the testator's sons do not owe anything to his estate. In each case the IOU's given by them are for debts which were statute-barred at the date of the testator's death. That does not prevent the application of the rule. There is, however, some evidence that the testator did not intend to enforce these IOU's; but I think that there is not sufficient evidence at present to exonerate these legatees. An inquiry must be directed
- E whether there were any and what debts due from them to the testator at the date of his death, and I further hold that if they do owe those sums, those sums with interest from the testator's death and not before must be deducted from their aliquot shares. These will be a declaration that the plaintiff and the other two sons ought to bring into account as against their respective shares of the testator's real and personal estate any sums due by them respectively
- F to the testator at the date of his death with interest at 4 per cent. from that date.

Charity—Cy-près doctrine—Legacy to charitable institution—Institution ceasing to exist after testator's death—Legacy applicable cy-près by the Crown.

A testator gave a legacy to a charitable institution which was in existence at his death, but which ceased to exist before the payment of the legacy.

Held: the legacy became the property of the charity on the testator's death, and when it ceased to exist its property fell to be administered by the Crown, who, according to custom, would apply it for some analogous purpose of charity.

B

Appeal by the Attorney-General from a decision of STIRLING, J., holding that a legacy of £200 "to the Orphanage of St. Dominic's, Newcastle," which was in existence at the testator's death but which ceased to exist before receiving payment, failed and fell into residue.

C

John Slevin made his will, dated Feb. 14, 1888, and thereby appointed his brother the plaintiff Michael Slevin, and the defendants Hopburn and Fogan his executors and trustees, and after giving a specific legacy to his wife, the testator bequeathed a number of legacies or sums of money varying from £20 to £400 to various persons, the gift of which was prefaced by the words "I bequeath the pecuniary legacies following." He then continued, "I bequeath the following charitable legacies," and proceeded to give a number of legacies to various Roman Catholic institutions, churches, and bodies, and among others, he gave as follows: "To the Orphanage of St. Dominic's, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, £200." The testator added :

"I direct that the receipt or receipts of the respective treasurers, secretaries, ministers, or managers, or any of them respectively for the time being of the said institutions, churches, or bodies shall be a sufficient discharge to my executors and trustees for the said charitable legacies respectively, and that the same legacies shall be paid out of such part of my personal estate as may be lawfully applied to charitable purposes, and preferably to every other payment thereout."

E

The testator bequeathed the residue of his estate to his trustees upon the trusts in his will mentioned. The testator died on Feb. 24, 1883.

F

The history of the Orphanage of St. Dominic's, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, appeared from the evidence to be as follows. In 1874 a Mrs. Priestman undertook at her own expense the charge of four or five orphan girls, and rented a small house for them in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and placed them under the care of a matron. In 1878 the number of orphans under her charge having increased she purchased a large house for them in Shield Field Green, Newcastle, in a Roman Catholic district, known as St. Dominic's, where they were looked after during her absence from ill-health first by a matron and afterwards by some Dominican sisters; and a brass plate was affixed to the door bearing the words "St. Dominic's Orphanage."

G

In 1882 the state of Mrs. Priestman's health obliged her to leave Newcastle, and she and her husband went to live at Clifton, to which place she removed most of the children from Newcastle, placing them in various orphanages in the neighbourhood, where some of them were still maintained at her expense. A few of them, however, were left at the house in Shield Field Green until about the end of March, 1883, when the last of them left, and Mrs. Priestman subsequently sold the house to the Dominican Sisters. Mrs. Priestman's husband having died she ceased to have a permanent residence, and now lived at various health resorts in England and the south of Europe.

H

The residuary legatees took out an originating summons for a declaration that the legacy of £200 given to the Orphanage of St. Dominic's lapsed, and formed part of the testator's residuary estate. Mrs. Priestman was not represented at the hearing, and did not claim the legacy. STIRLING, J., held (following Clark v. Taylor (1)) that the legacy could not be applied cy-près, but failed and fell into the residue. The Attorney-General appealed.

Mar. 20, 1891. KAY, L.J., read the following judgment of the court.—This case raises a question which seems only to have occurred in two instances in the books; namely, whether a charitable bequest to an institution which comes to an end after the death of the testator, but before the legacy is paid over, fails for the benefit of the residuary legatee, as in the case of a lapse. Properly speaking, a lapse can only occur by failure of the object in the lifetime of the testator. But it is possible that a will might be so framed as that a subsequent failure of the object of the charitable gift might occasion a resulting trust for the benefit of the testator's estate. We have not been referred to any such case, nor have we found any.

A surplus of charity funds arising from decay of the particular charity, or from increase in the value of the charity property beyond the requirements of the special object, has been treated as charity property to be administered cy-près. LORD ELDON, in A.-G. v. Bristol Corpn. (2) states expressly that this is a settled rule in case of a surplus arising from an increase of the fund. A.-G. v. Ironmongers' Co. (3) decides the same point, where the object fails after the bequest has taken effect; and see A.-G. v. Earl of Craven (4), Chamberlayne v. Brockett (5) and Lyons Corpn. v. Advocate-General of Bengal (6).

In A.-G. v. Wilson (7) a difference is suggested where the will shows an intention to create a resulting trust, as where the charitable purposes do not exhaust the whole income of the fund which is dealt with at the time of the disposition, but something is left undisposed of from the first. This is not a case of that kind. It is a simple legacy of a sum of £200 to the Orphanage of St. Dominic's, Newcastle-on-Tyne. If it had been received the whole might have been expended at once, and even if not received the amount might have been anticipated by borrowing from a banker or otherwise and charging the legacy with the amount so borrowed. BOWEN, L.J., has some doubt as to the effect of the evidence, but LINDLEY, L.J., and KAY, L.J., think it must be treated as the learned judge has done, namely, that, upon the evidence, the orphanage, though about to be discontinued at the beginning of the year 1883, had not ceased to exist at the time of the testator's death. The orphanage did come to an end before the legacy was paid over.

In the case of a legacy to an individual, if he survive the testator it could not be argued that the legacy would fall into the residue. Even if the legatee died intestate and without next-of-kin, still the money was his, and the residuary legatee would have no right whatever against the Crown. So, if the legatee were a corporation which was dissolved after the testator's death, the residuary legatee would have no claim. Obviously it can make no difference that the legatee ceased to exist immediately after the death of the testator. The same law must be applicable whether it was a day, a month, a year, or, as might well happen, ten years after, the legacy not having been paid either from delay occasioned by the administration of the estate or owing to part of the estate not having been got in. The legacy became the property of the legatee upon the death of the testator, though he might not for some reason obtain the receipt of it till long after. When once it became the absolute property of the legatee, that is equivalent to saying that it must be provided for, and the residue is only what remains after making such provision. It does not for all purposes cease to be part of the testator's estate until the executors admit assets, and appropriate or pay it over; but that is merely for their convenience and that of the estate. The rights as between the particular legatee and the residue are fixed at the testator's death.

These propositions are so obvious that it would seem impossible to dispute them without some authority to the contrary. Is there any such authority? In Hayter v. Trego (8) SIR JOHN LEACH, M.R., had this very case to deal with. A testator gave a legacy of £500 to a voluntary society called the Plymouth and Devon Asylum for the Reception of Female Penitents. He died in June, 1821, at which time the asylum was still in existence, but on May 29, 1822, before the legacy was paid, the society was dissolved. We have examined the record; it is plain from it that the contest was between the next-of-kin (there being no residuary gift) and the

A Attorney-General; and SIR JOHN LEACH, M.R., decided the case in the only way which on principle seemed to us to be possible, viz., that the fund must be applied for charitable purposes, resembling that which had failed. It is said, and perhaps with truth, that there was in that case a sufficient indication of a general charitable intention to justify the decision, even if there had been no such institution in existence at the testator's death, and reliance is placed on the more recent decision

B of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., in Clark v. Taylor (1).

According to the report in DREWRY, the bequest was £50 to a female orphan school in Greenwich, patronised by Mrs. Enderby. The testator died in October, 1846 (which is in the report incorrectly printed 1840), and the school was discontinued in November of the same year. In the WEEKLY REPORTER it is stated that the school was discontinued about the same time that the testator died.

C Neither in the arguments nor in the judgment was reliance placed upon the circumstance that the institution was actually in existence at the testator's death. In the judgment it was treated as a clear case of lapse—that is, as though there was no such institution at the testator's death, and the only matter dealt with by the Vice-Chancellor was the question whether, on that supposition, there was such a general intention of charity as to justify an administration cy-près. The Vice-Chancellor decided that there was not, and that the residuary legatees were entitled.

D Hayter v. Trego (8) was not referred to. The only cases cited were Cherry v. Mott (9) and Loscombe v. Wintringham (10), in one of which the failure of the charity occurred in the testator's lifetime, and in the other—what is equivalent—the legatee declined the bequest. It was upon the authority of this decision of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., that the learned judge in the court below chiefly rested his

We cannot treat Clark v. Taylor (1) as a decision which supports the view he has taken. It seems to us that all the Vice-Chancellor intended to decide was that, assuming the institution to have failed in the testator's lifetime, there was no such general purpose of charity as would warrant the distribution cy-près. We have not found any case in which the supposed view of the Vice-Chancellor in Clark v.

F Taylor (1) has been followed. In the textbooks, TUDOR'S CHARITABLE TRUSTS (3rd Edn.) 41; JARMAN ON WILLS (4th Edn.), vol. 1, pp. 246, 247 (doubtfully), and THEOBALD ON WILLS (3rd Edn.) 277, and also by LORD HATHERLEY in *Fisk v. If it decided that failure of the institution after the testator's death

G occasioned a lapse, or on any other ground entitled the residuary legatee to the legacy, we are of opinion that the decision should be overruled; but we do not believe that anything of the kind was intended.

In the present case we think that the Attorney-General must succeed, not on the ground that there is such a general charitable intention that the fund should be administered cy-près, even if the charity had failed in the testator's lifetime,

H but because, as the charity existed at the testator's death, this legacy became the property of that charity, and on its ceasing to exist its property falls to be administered by the Crown, who will apply it according to custom for some analogous purpose of charity, as in A.-G. v. Ironmongers' Co. (3), Wilson v. Barnes (13), and the other cases collected in TYSSSEN ON CHARITABLE BEQUESTS, 440. The appeal will, therefore, be allowed.

RAPIER v. LONDON TRAMWAYS CO.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.), May 12, 15, 16, 1893]

Nuisance—Statutory powers—Exercise—Authority to tramway company to erect “works and conveniences”—Stables for horses working on tramway.

The defendant company, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, acquired under the authority of a special Act the undertakings of two tramways companies, which had power under their special Acts to purchase land for the purposes of their undertakings. The defendant company was subsequently authorised by special Act to construct and maintain three extensions of the tramways “with all proper rails, plates, works, and conveniences connected therewith.” They acquired land near one of the extensions and erected stabling thereon for the accommodation of horses employed on the tramway. A neighbouring householder claimed an injunction to restrain a nuisance caused by smells arising from the stables.

Held: although the defendant company was authorised by the Act to have stables and horses, they were not justified in creating a nuisance, and it was no defence that they had taken all reasonable care to prevent it; the plaintiff was, therefore, entitled to an injunction.

Appeal from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., reported, [1893] 2 Ch. 588, that smells and noises coming from stables erected by the defendant company under statutory powers constituted a nuisance and that the plaintiff was entitled to damages and an injunction.

The London Tramways Co., Ltd., was incorporated in 1870 under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867; and by the London Tramways Co., Ltd. (Purchase) Act, 1873, the Metropolitan Street Tramways Co. and the Pimlico, Peckham, and Greenwich Street Tramways Co. were authorised to sell their respective undertakings to the company, and the same were sold to and vested in the company accordingly. The Metropolitan Street Tramways Act, 1869, which related to the undertakings so transferred to the company, provided by s. 63 that:

“The company may from time to time purchase or acquire (by agreement) such land as they may require for their undertaking, not exceeding in the whole twenty acres.”

The London Tramways Co., Ltd. (Various Powers), Act, 1888, authorised the construction by the company of extensions of their tramway system, namely, a

- A double line tramway of about six furlongs in length from High Street, Clapham, to Clapham Common, and two double line tramways of about five furlongs and four furlongs respectively, commencing by junction with the first-mentioned extension. Section 4 of the Act of 1888 provided that the company might make, form, lay down, work, use, and maintain the above-mentioned tramways in accordance with the deposited plans and sections, "with all proper rails, plates, works, and conveniences connected therewith." Section 24 gave the company power to make, maintain, and alter crossings, etc., as they might find necessary or convenient for the efficient working of the tramways "or for providing access to any stables . . . of the company." One of the tramways authorised by this Act ran along the Balham Road, out of which the Tooting Park Road opened. In April, 1891, the company acquired certain land in Tooting Park Road and erected thereon stabling capable of accommodating about 400 horses. These buildings were situated about forty-two yards from a private dwelling-house belonging to the plaintiff R. C. Rapier. At the date of these proceedings about 200 horses were kept by the defendants in the stables. This action was brought by the plaintiff, claiming an injunction to restrain the company from using these premises so as to cause a nuisance to the plaintiff by smell, noise, or otherwise. Subsequently to the commencement of the proceedings the company took steps to diminish the noise on their premises, with the result that the nuisance from this cause was considerably, if not completely abated. The smells, however, continued, and upon the evidence KEKEWICH, J., came to the conclusion that, though intermittent, they were such as to constitute a nuisance to the plaintiff, and he gave the plaintiff 40s. damages in respect of the noise, and granted an injunction in respect of the smell. The company appealed.
- E W. Willis, Q.C., Renshaw, Q.C., and J. S. Gregson for the defendant company. Finlay, Q.C., Warmington, Q.C., and P. S. Stokes for the plaintiff.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think it is impossible to disturb the judgment or order which is appealed from. The case is one of very considerable importance, both to the plaintiff and to the defendant company, and it is of importance from a public point of view.

The first point which we have to consider is the Act of Parliament under which, if at all, the defendant company can justify what they have done. What they have done is this: Being a company formed for making tramways, they have bought a piece of land near the plaintiff's house, about five acres in extent, they have erected at very considerable expense, very excellent stables upon this land, capable of holding 400 horses, but used, apparently, up to the present time, for 200, more or less. All that is perfectly lawful; there is no reason why people should not have stables, and large stables too, provided only they carry on their stable business in such a way as not to occasion a nuisance to their neighbours. The Act of Parliament to which counsel for the defendant company has referred does not appear to me to come to anything more than this: It authorises the company to create and make a certain tramway, and it proceeds on the assumption (I do not think it authorises) that they may use animal power. Animal power for such a purpose in this country means horse power, and it assumes, as a matter of course, that they must have horses. That involves, as a natural consequence, stables to put them in. To that extent the Act of Parliament authorises them to have stables and horses. I agree with counsel for the defendant company, that it is for the directors to say, within limits which I will discuss presently, where they shall have stables, how many horses they will have and where they will locate them.

What are the limits of that discretion? Here we approach a matter of very considerable importance. Counsel says that this Act of Parliament, which does not say anything expressly about stables or horses which is worth commenting on, does give the directors power to do whatever in the exercise of their discretion they may think reasonable and proper, and in their own interests, provided they take all reasonable care not to commit a nuisance. Is that the true construction of the Act of Parliament, or is it that they may do what they think right in the exercise of their own discretion, provided they do not commit a nuisance? Which is it? The whole case seems to me up to a certain point to turn on that. An Act of Parliament might be so worded as to cast upon them no greater duty than the duty to take reasonable care. Unless the Act of Parliament is so worded as to limit their duty to that extent, I think the common law must prevail; that they must exercise their power so as not to commit a nuisance. A

At common law, if I am sued for a nuisance, and the nuisance is proved, it is no defence on my part to say and to prove that I have taken all reasonable care to prevent it. An Act of Parliament may be an answer. It was an answer in London, Brighton, and South Coast Rail. Co. v. Truman (1), and it might be an answer here if the Act of Parliament went further than it did. I cannot find that the Act of Parliament contains any clause which warrants us in saying that no limit is set to the exercise of the discretion of the directors, or the duty to take reasonable care not to create a nuisance. The only limit I can find is the limit which is set by the general law of the country, that they do not commit a nuisance. Within that limit they may have what stables they like, they may have what number of horses they like, and they may conduct them how they like. B

That being the law upon the matter, I now pass on to consider the facts of this case. Does the company so carry on their business as to commit a nuisance? What is meant by the word "nuisance" in this particular case? The alleged nuisances were two, noise and smell. We have not to consider the question of noise now, so I will say nothing more about that. It is alleged that they carry on business in the stable in such a way as to create smell to such an extent as seriously to diminish the comfort of the neighbours who live near, and in particular seriously to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of the house and land of the plaintiff. That is the alleged nuisance. Because somebody with a sensitive nose sniffs some ammonia and does not like it, that will not make a nuisance; it is a question of degree. You can only appeal to the common sense of ordinary people. The test is, whether this smell is so bad and continuous as seriously to interfere with comfort and enjoyment. No one says it is so bad as to interfere with health. C

Looking at it from that point of view it is obvious we cannot go to the length of saying that there is no evidence of the nuisance. There is plenty of evidence of it. The learned judge having seen all the witnesses has come to the conclusion that there is a nuisance. I cannot agree with the observation that this conclusion is entirely unfounded; the utmost that I could say is, that the injunction ought not to go without a new trial. Would it be right and fair to put the parties to the expense of a new trial? Can I say there is so much unsatisfactory evidence that the court ought not to act upon the judgment of the learned judge in the court below? I do not think we ought to say that. [His LORDSHIP considered the evidence, and continued:] Making all the allowance and discounts which can reasonably, fairly, and properly be made on both sides—not to the plaintiff more than the defendant company—there is a body of evidence which, I think, it is impossible to get over. The consequence is, we cannot disturb the order which has been made. That order is in the common form, namely, to restrain the defendants from carrying on the business of their stables so as to create a nuisance to the plaintiff. That is the form of the injunction. What that may involve I cannot possibly say. If the defendants are right in saying that they cannot concentrate their stables to such an extent as is desirable without committing a nuisance to the neighbourhood, then they cannot concentrate their horses to such a degree. That is all. It is a mere question of money; it is nothing but economy which requires them to crowd their horses together. In their attempt to economise, which is a laudable and proper attempt, I think they have gone too far. If they cannot have 200 horses together, even when they take proper precautions, without committing a nuisance, all I can say is they cannot have so many horses together. D E F G H I

A No doubt it is a serious matter to them, but I cannot disagree with the learned judge who tried the case in the court below.

Notes. The Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, s. 8 (3), has been replaced by s. 270 (1) of the Companies Act, 1948. Section 145 of the Companies Act, 1862, has been repealed. See now s. 310 of the Companies Act, 1948. Section 255 of the Companies Act, 1929, which has been re-enacted in s. 310 of the 1948 Act, effected a change in the law. Under s. 145 of the 1862 Act a creditor seeking a winding-up order had to allege and prove that the continuance of a voluntary winding-up was prejudicial to his rights but under s. 310 of the 1948 Act it is necessary for the petitioner to prove that his rights are prejudiced only in the case of a petition by a contributory.

Petition presented by a simple contract creditor asking that a company might be compulsorily wound-up.

The Medical Battery Co., Ltd., was incorporated in 1889 with a capital of £100,000, divided into 20,000 shares of £5 each. All the shares had been issued and credited as fully paid up. The debentures which had been issued by the company were alleged to constitute a charge upon all the assets of the company. On Oct. 26, 1893, an action was commenced by debenture-holders against the company to enforce their securities. On Oct. 27 a receiver was appointed and on Oct. 30 an order was made, empowering him to manage the business of the company. On Nov. 4 judgment was given in the action. The petition was presented by a simple contract creditor on Oct. 27, 1893, asking that the company might be compulsorily wound-up. On Nov. 3 the company held a general meeting, at which resolutions were passed for a voluntary liquidation, and appointing the receiver in the action voluntary liquidator. Subsequently to the passing of the above resolutions the petition was with the consent of the court amended by asking in the alternative that the voluntary winding-up should be continued under the supervision of the court, and that some person who was independent of the debenture-holders, should be appointed liquidator in the place of the receiver. The petition, as amended, had been re-advertised, and now came on to be heard.

In October and November, 1893, charges of fraud had been made against the company in certain newspapers. These frauds were alleged to have been made by the company in the course of their business with the outside public. At the time when the petition came on for hearing a libel action brought by the managing director of the company against the newspapers concerned was pending and criminal proceedings against the managing director and others concerned were proceeding.

The only point in the case calling for a report was whether s. 8 (3) of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, applied in a case where the alleged fraud was in the dealings of the company with the outside public.

Bramwell Davis, Macnaghten and Whittaker for other creditors.

Haldinstein (Boxall with him) for shareholders, and Tanner for the plaintiffs in the debenture-holders' action.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—At the time when the petition was first presented no resolution for a voluntary liquidation had been passed. All that had happened then was, that a debenture-holders' action had been commenced, and Mr. Davis had been appointed a receiver. After the presentation of the petition, the resolution that the company should be wound-up voluntarily was passed. According to my understanding of the practice under s. 145 of the Companies Act, 1862, although that resolution was not passed until after the presentation of the petition, I ought not to make a compulsory order unless I am of opinion that the rights of the creditors will be prejudiced by a voluntary liquidation [but see now s. 310 of the Companies Act, 1948]. It has been suggested that I ought to take into consideration that the rights of the creditors will be prejudiced by the continuance of the voluntary liquidation not only as regards matters affecting them pecuniarily, but also by their exclusion from the benefit of a public examination given by s. 8 (3) of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, where a compulsory order is made. I propose to deal with both those suggestions, and see whether there is any evidence that the creditors will be prejudiced by not getting the benefit of s. 8 (3) of the Act of 1890.

I will deal with the last suggestion first, and I say that, in my opinion, I should be acting wrongly if I were to hold that the section was intended to apply to a case where charges are made against a company of having committed frauds in the course of its business upon members of the outside public, and

A not connected in any way with the promotion or formation of the company—that is, upon persons who have simply dealt with the company, and not upon shareholders as regards their membership in the company. It seems to me that a police court is the proper place for an investigation of the kind said to be required here, and I ought not to take that into consideration at all in determining whether the creditors are likely to be prejudiced by the continuance

B of the voluntary liquidation. The only way in which it would be right to take into consideration at all the fact that these charges have been made, would be in considering the desire of some persons that the voluntary liquidation should be continued with a view to carrying on the business as a going concern. For that purpose it would be material to consider whether having regard to the fact that the charges have been made, the business would be likely to be

C carried on successfully, but so far as an instigation into them is concerned, I ought not to say that the creditors will be prejudiced by not obtaining the benefit of s. 8 (3) of the Act of 1890. [HIS LORDSHIP then proceeded to deal with the particular facts of the case, and came to the conclusion that the rights of the creditors would be prejudiced by the continuance of the voluntary liquidation, and he accordingly made a compulsory order.]

Appeal from a decision of the registrar of the Brighton County Court dismissing a petition, but staying proceedings on the order for seven days, or until an appeal was heard. C

On Dec. 15, 1892, an action had been commenced against the debtor, a solicitor, in which judgment was signed on Jan. 25. On Jan. 17, 1893, a petition was presented against the debtor, the debt being in respect of moneys received by the debtor as the solicitor to the petitioning creditor. The act of bankruptcy relied on was, that on Dec. 24, 1892, the debtor gave notice to the petitioning creditor that he was about to suspend payment. The letter in which this notice was contained was type-written with an accompanying memorandum dated Dec. 26, and was headed "Private and confidential, without prejudice," and was as follows: D

Dear Sir,—I am very sorry to have to inform you that through the great pecuniary pressure to which I have been subjected during the last few months, and the fact that the distraction caused by this pressure and my illness has prevented my full attention to business, and allowed affairs to get into a great tangle owing to not having got in money due to me, this has resulted in my becoming absolutely unable to pay my debts at once, although I have reduced my staff and have and am prepared still further to cut down my personal expenditure, which at one time was vastly greater than it is now, though it seemed to me warranted by my profits, which have in several cases unfortunately proved to be nominal only, as I have lost several sums through various causes, principally the fall of the value of property, which is now very seldom equal to the former estimates of valuers. The result is, that I must of necessity appeal to my creditors for time, and if they will not give it, I must of course become bankrupt. This would mean a heavy loss to everyone, for my position and appointments would be gone, and I should have no possibility of recovering them or paying the loss to my creditors, which would be my first wish. The winding-up of estates in bankruptcy is expensive, and my assets are so scattered, that they would be very much more difficult to get in than most people's and the expense of doing this and the loss that would be entailed by hurried and forced realisation would be enormous. I have at least sixteen creditors who are taking almost every conceivable means against me, and therefore there is no time for any meeting or parley. I must know at once from all of them whether they will give time as suggested by the enclosed reply form, or waste my assets and their chances by driving me into bankruptcy. To be of any use to avert bankruptcy, the enclosed must reach my office on Tuesday evening, the 27th inst., or the sheriff will proceed to sale. I regret exceedingly having to write to you thus, and remain,—Yours truly, Charles James Daintrey, Dec. 26, 1892." F

The enclosure was as follows: G

"I agree to accept the sum owing to me by Mr. Daintrey on all accounts (which are to be agreed between us as promptly as possible) by three instal- H

These instalments to be without prejudice to any securities now held by me and to be paid at intervals of four, eight, and twelve months from the present time. In the event of bankruptcy, this arrangement not to be binding on me."

B The letter was received by the petitioning creditor on Dec. 26. Objection was taken before the registrar that the letter being without prejudice could not be looked at for any purpose. On Feb. 3 the registrar placed on the file a written judgment dismissing the petition with costs, but staying proceedings on the order for seven days, and if notice of appeal was given within that time, then until the appeal was disposed of. The petitioning creditor appealed.

May 6, 1893. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., read the following judgment of the court.—In this case the question raised was as to the admissibility of a document which was expressed to be written "without prejudice." A petition in bankruptcy was presented which alleged as an act of bankruptcy that the debtor had given notice to a creditor that he had suspended, or was about to suspend, payment. It was proposed to prove this act of bankruptcy by the production of the document in question, and it was objected that the document could not be put in evidence, being written "without prejudice." It was suggested, in answer to this objection, that the document in fact was a circular, addressed by the debtor to his creditors, and that a document of such a character would be admissible in evidence, although headed "without prejudice." To this it was replied that there was no evidence dehors the document itself that it was a document of such a character, or that it had been sent to anyone besides the petitioner. The petitioner, by his counsel, in reply to a question by the learned registrar before whom the petition was being heard, deliberately elected to rely only on the sending of the circular to the petitioner, and offered no evidence of the document having been sent to any other creditors. Under these circumstances it did not seem to us that we ought to allow further evidence to be put in on the appeal. We have, therefore, to decide the case on the materials before the learned registrar, who decided that the document was inadmissible, and dismissed the petition for want of proof of the act of bankruptcy alleged.

In my opinion, this decision was wrong. I think that the document was admissible in evidence. In the first place, I think that the court was entitled to look at the document and its contents for the purpose of deciding the question of its admissibility. It seems to me that the question of its admissibility depended upon a matter of fact, which matter of fact it was the function of the registrar in his character of judge, and not in his character of jurymen, to decide, and it seems to me that the judge for this purpose was entitled to look at the document though not in evidence, just as he would have been entitled to have looked at the document if he had been trying a case before a jury, before allowing it to be put in evidence before the jury.

I In my opinion, the rule which excludes documents marked "without prejudice" has no application unless some person is in dispute or negotiation with another, and terms are offered for the settlement of the dispute or negotiation, and it seems to me that the judge must necessarily be entitled to look at the document in order to determine whether the conditions under which alone the rule applies exist. The rule is a rule adopted to enable disputants without prejudice to engage in discussion for the purpose of arriving at terms of peace, and unless there is a dispute or negotiation and an offer, the rule has no application. It seems to me that the judge must be entitled to look at the document to determine whether the document does contain an offer of terms. Moreover, I think that the rule has no application to a document which in its nature may prejudice the person to whom it is addressed. It may be that the words "without prejudice" are intended to mean without prejudice to the writer if the offer is rejected; but in my opinion the writer is not entitled to make this reservation in respect of a document which from its character may prejudice the person to whom it is addressed if he should reject the offer, and for this reason, also, I think the judge is entitled to look at the document, to determine its character. A

The next question which arises is the question whether this document is of a character fulfilling the conditions to which the rule of exclusion applies. This is the document: [His Lordship read the document.] It seems to me that some of the conditions are complied with, but not all. There was a dispute, for there was an action pending between the parties. There was an offer, i.e., the offer of a composition which was intended to apply, among other things, to the petitioner's claim in the action, but the document, the letter of the debtor to the petitioner, was, in my opinion, more than this. It was a clear act of bankruptcy, and it was notice to the petitioner of such act of bankruptcy, and it seems to me that a notice of an act of bankruptcy cannot be given "without prejudice," because the document in question was one which from its character might prejudicially affect the recipient, whether or not he accepted the terms offered thereby. For the reasons I have already given, I think that such a document does not fall within the rule which excludes offers for peace written without prejudice, and ought to have been admitted in evidence. If admitted, it conclusively proves the act of bankruptcy. It follows that the learned registrar ought to have made the receiving order, and we now make it, and allow this appeal. C

B Discovery—Privilege—Production of document—Legal professional privilege—Report of accident by servant to defendant company—Probability, almost certainty, that litigation would ensue—Report made in anticipation of litigation and for use of solicitors.

C An accident, upon which the plaintiff subsequently founded an action for negligence against the defendants, occurred about six o'clock in the evening, and on the following day a written report thereof was made by the defendants' servant, at a time when no action had been commenced or even threatened. Privilege from inspection was claimed for this report, on the ground that it had been made or had come into existence solely for the use of the defendant company's solicitor, in anticipation of this action, to advise the company in reference thereto.

D Held: although the report came into existence before the actual commencement of the action, the circumstances of the case were such as to raise a high probability, amounting almost to a certainty, that litigation would ensue; therefore, as the report had been made in anticipation of such litigation and for the sole purpose of being laid before the defendant company's legal adviser, it was privileged from disclosure to the other side.

I Appeal from a decision of KENNEDY, J., in chambers, reversing the master's order for the delivery of a better affidavit of documents, and for inspection.

The action was brought in respect of personal injuries alleged to have been inflicted through the negligence of the defendants in knowingly using a vicious horse to draw an omnibus in which the plaintiff was travelling. The horse kicked through the glass window of the omnibus, and seriously injured the plaintiff, who was sitting inside. The incident happened in the evening of Sept. 16, and on the following day a written report was made for the defendants by the conductor of the omnibus, there being at that time no action commenced or even threatened. A The defendants, in their affidavit of documents, included this report, but they claimed privilege for it, and refused to allow the other side to inspect it, on the ground that it "had been made or had come into existence for the use of the company's solicitor in this action, and as evidence and information as to how evidence B could be obtained and otherwise for the use of the said solicitor to enable him to conduct the defence in this action, and to advise the defendant company in reference thereto, and that it had been made under the actual direction of the defendants' solicitor, and for no purpose other than for his use in anticipation of litigation, and in the conduct of this action."

The plaintiff applied for a further and better affidavit of documents and for C inspection. The master granted this order but was reversed by KENNEDY, J., in chambers. The plaintiff appealed.

G. M. Cohen for the plaintiff.

M. Powell for the defendants.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of KENNEDY, J., was right. D
The paragraph in the affidavit in which protection is claimed for these two documents is a very comprehensive one, and has evidently been prepared with reference to the expressions used in the several cases which have been decided on the subject. Counsel for the plaintiff says that if the paragraph is true it is a sufficient protection, but he says that in the circumstances of this case it is impossible for E it to be true or accurate, because this action was not in fact in existence when the report in question was made. We are told that the complaint is in reference to a vicious horse of the defendants, which kicked the plaintiff, an inside passenger in an omnibus to which it was attached, injuring him severely, and rendering him insensible, and, after that, I should suppose that an action was as near a dead moral certainty as anything could be, and I cannot think that it would make any difference whether at the time when this document came into existence F an action had been formally threatened or not. If the circumstances were such that no reasonable person could doubt that an action would follow, they might lay the foundation of privilege for such a document as this.

I do not know that the point is entirely a new one, for in Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co. v. Quick (1) the protection is held to apply to cases where G the litigation is not actually in existence if the document is bona fide prepared, and came into existence solely for the purpose of obtaining the advice of the party's professional adviser. COTTON, L.J., says (3 Q.B.D. at p. 322) that "the true principle is that if a document comes into existence for the purpose of being communicated to the solicitor with the object of obtaining his advice, or of enabling him either to prosecute or defend an action, then it is privileged," H and the judgments of the other lords justices (BRAMWELL and BRETT, L.J.J.) are to much the same effect. There was abundance in the present case to indicate that this document came into existence for no purpose other than for the use of the solicitor, in anticipation of this action, to advise the defendants in reference thereto. The case clearly falls within those decisions, and our attention was not called to any authority in the other direction. In Anderson v. Bank of British I Columbia (2), the only words in the affidavit applicable to the documents in question were

"on the ground that they are correspondence between the defendants and their agents in reference to the subject of this suit," and that was not a sufficient allegation on which to found privilege.

Cook v. North Metropolitan Tramway Co. (3) was also referred to. We have not got the affidavit in that case, and are, therefore, driven to rely on the report;

A but it is clear that more must have appeared upon the affidavits there than appears in the report, and that the documents there fell far below that used in the present case. The affidavit in the present case says that this report

"came into existence solely for the purpose of being laid before a solicitor for his advice,"

B and I am of opinion that such a communication is privileged. I have treated this as in substance an application for inspection, the substantial question between the parties.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Counsel for the plaintiff invites us to say that the affidavit cannot be true, but he has not satisfied me that that is

C not so, and I think that a sufficient case for declining to produce the report is made out. The affidavit says that the report was made "for no purpose other than for the use of the defendants' solicitor in anticipation of litigation,"

D and that is a most important allegation. This report came into existence before the actual commencement of the action, but litigation may either be reasonably apprehended, or threatened, or actually begun. I assume that this belongs to the first of those three classes, when there is a high probability, amounting almost to certainty, that an action will ensue, and a report is made to enable the solicitor to conduct the defence of any action which may be brought; in which event the case is covered by Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co. v. Quick (1), and the rule to be gathered is that, when a document comes into existence under circumstances such as these, privilege will attach, though an action be not in existence or even threatened. Cook v. North Metropolitan Tramway Co. (3) is capable of explanation on the ground that the report there was made only in the ordinary discharge of duties. Here there is no such circumstance, and our decision, therefore, in no way conflicts with that case.

DONOVAN v. LAING, WHARTON AND DOWN CONSTRUCTION SYNDICATE

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.), March 2, 1893]

Master and Servant—Liability of master for act of servant—Temporary servant—Servant lent by general master—Negligence of servant—Liability of general master for injury to servant of temporary master.

A master who, whether for reward or not, has lent his servant to another person for a particular purpose is not responsible for the negligence of the servant in the course of his employment by the borrower, if he has given up to the borrower the right of controlling the servant in such employment.

The plaintiff was employed by J. & Co., and, while engaged in loading a ship, was struck and injured by the arm of a crane belonging to the defendants. The crane was being driven by W., a crane driver employed by the defendants and lent by them to J. & Co. under an agreement by which J. & Co. should have the use of the crane when they required it and the defendants should supply fuel and a man to drive it. At the time of the accident W. was acting according to signals given by the plaintiff, but he negligently swung the arm of the crane round without waiting for a signal. In an action for damages brought by the plaintiff against the defendants in respect of injuries caused by the negligent acts of their servant,

Held: although W. could be said to be the defendants' servant for a number of purposes and the defendants were his general masters, he was not their servant in respect of the working of the crane at the time of the accident as at that time they had parted with the right of controlling him; they were not responsible for his acts while he was under the control of J. & Co.; and, therefore, the action failed.

E Appeal from a decision of POLLOCK, B., upon further consideration after the trial of the action with a jury brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries caused to him by negligence of a person alleged to have been at the time a servant of the defendants.

At the time of the accident the plaintiff was employed by Jones & Co., and was engaged upon the loading of a vessel at a wharf. The goods were being moved from the wharf into the vessel by means of a crane which stood upon the wharf, and which was being worked by a man named Wand. The crane belonged to the defendants, and was being used for the loading at the time when the accident happened, under an agreement made between the defendants and Jones & Co., by which, as was stated in answer to an interrogatory delivered by the plaintiff, the defendants,

G "in or about the month of August, 1891, verbally agreed with Messrs. Jones & Co., that they should have the use of the steam crane when they required the same, and that the defendant company should supply the fuel and necessary power, and also a man to drive such crane, Messrs. Jones & Co. paying to the company therefor the sum of £50 per annum."

H In pursuance of this agreement the defendants had lent the crane and their servant, Wand, to work it for the purpose of loading the vessel on the occasion when the accident happened. Wand's duty on the day in question was to work the crane for putting goods into the vessel, and to move the arm of the crane according to signals given by the plaintiff, a servant of Jones & Co. Wand negligently moved the crane without waiting for a signal, and struck and injured the plaintiff. At the trial of the action the jury found that Wand was guilty of negligence, and assessed the damages at £500. Upon further consideration POLLOCK, B., held that, as Wand was acting on the occasion in question as the servant of Jones & Co., and not of the defendants, the case was governed by the decision in Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. (1), and he therefore gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

I Cock, Q.C., and Lynden Bell for the plaintiff.
Lawson Walton, Q.C., and J. F. P. Rawlinson for the defendants, were not called on to argue.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff has brought an action against the defendants in respect of injuries caused to him by the negligent acts of a servant of the defendants, for whose negligence at that time the defendants are said to be liable. A

The facts of the case are not in dispute. The firm of Jones & Co. were loading a ship from a quay. They had no crane of their own; but the defendants have a crane which they sometimes let out to other people, and also a man who is in charge of the crane. This man was therefore a servant of the defendants with regard to the crane, unless something else happened. On the occasion when the accident happened to the plaintiff, the defendants had let out on hire to Jones & Co. for consideration this crane for the purpose of its being used as a crane ordinarily is used when a ship is being loaded. The ordinary way of using a crane on a quay for the purpose of putting goods into a ship is well known. The goods are slung on to the crane, and then the arm of the crane is turned round so as to bring the goods over that part of the ship on which they are to be lowered. The people who are conducting the loading determine on what part of the ship the goods are to be lowered, whether on the fore or after deck or hold, and they tell the man who is working the crane how far round to move the arm of the crane, and when the goods are to be raised or lowered, so that every motion of the crane is under their orders and control. When a crane is let or lent to people loading a ship for the purpose of being used in the ordinary way that a crane is used in that operation, every motion of the crane, whether it is to be moved so as to be over the goods lying on the quay or over any particular part of the ship, whether the goods are to be lifted up or lowered, and whether they are to be stopped in the middle of their being lifted up or lowered, every motion of the crane for those purposes must take place according to the orders given by those who are engaged in loading the ship, and to whom the crane has been let or lent. Those are facts which cannot be questioned, and it would be no use asking what a jury thought about the matter. B C D E

Therefore we have in this case these facts, that the defendants let or lent their crane with a man in charge of it to Jones & Co., for a consideration to be used in the way that I have described. The man in charge of the crane, whose name was Wand, was therefore for some purposes a servant of the defendants. If he had negligently let the crane get out of order and an accident consequently happened, I should think that the defendants would be liable, or it may well be that they would be liable. But here the accident did not happen from anything of that kind, it happened in consequence of the manner in which the crane was worked. Wand negligently swung the arm of the crane round at an improper time, and so hurt the plaintiff. The accident was caused by negligence in the manner of working the crane, and in the manner of working the crane Wand's duty was to act according to the orders, and under the absolute control of Jones & Co. F G

The question then is, whose servant was Wand in respect of his working the crane? It is true that he was selected by the defendants to work the crane; it is true that he was paid his wages by the defendants; and those are circumstances which, if nothing else intervened, would go far in showing that he was the servant of the defendants. And for a great many things he was their servant, but he was not their servant in respect of the working of the crane at the time when the accident happened. Although Jones & Co. did not pay him, the operation in which he was concerned was to be conducted solely by them, and he was bound to obey their orders, and was under their control for that purpose. I have no doubt that, if Jones & Co. saw him misconducting himself and disobeying their orders, they would have a right to send him away from their employment to his own master. In that sense they could discharge him from that employment. H I

That being so, was Wand the servant of Jones & Co., so as to make them liable for his negligence in working the crane? In considering this question, it is hardly necessary to seek for authority. It is no use going back to all the old cases which are to be found long before Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. (1). In that case the question was, whose servant was a man named Lawrence? He was the general

A servant of the defendants, but it was held that in respect of the operation in which he had acted negligently he was not the servant of the defendants so as to make them liable, but of someone else. COCKBURN, C.J., puts the case thus (2 C.P.D. at p. 209) :

"It appears to me that the defendants put the engine and this man Lawrence at Whittle's disposal just as much as if they had lent both to him. But when one person lends his servant to another for a particular employment, the servant for anything done in that particular employment must be dealt with as the servant of the man to whom he is lent, although he remains the general servant of the person who lent him."

Lawrence in that case was clearly the general servant of the defendants, but was lent to Whittle for a particular purpose. In the course of that particular employment he was negligent, and it was held that as regards that negligence he was the servant of Whittle, and not the servant of his general master. The reason of that decision was that Whittle had control of the employment in which Lawrence being engaged had acted negligently, and the general master of Lawrence, having lent him, had not control of him in that employment.

The passage that has been read to us from the opinion of LORD WATSON in Johnson v. Lindsay & Co. (2) seems to me to be exactly the same. He says ([1891] A.C. at p. 382) :

"I do not think it necessary to discuss the question under what circumstances the servant of one man ought to be considered the servant of another; I can well conceive that the general servant of A. might, by working towards a common end along with the servants of B. and submitting himself to the control and orders of B., become pro hac vice B.'s servant, in such sense as not only to disable him from recovering from B. for injuries sustained through the fault of B.'s proper servants, but to exclude the liability of A. for injury occasioned, by his fault, to B.'s own workmen."

That is exactly the same doctrine, and it seems to me to be well established, and to be applicable to the present case.

With regard to Jones v. Liverpool Corpn. (3), GROVE, J., seems to have thought that there was a difference between the case of a general master lending his servant for reward, and lending him gratis. I can only say that that is a matter which seems to me to have nothing to do with the principle upon which in these cases a man is said to have been a servant of one person, and not a servant of someone else.

It has also been argued that Wand was the servant both of Jones & Co. and the defendants. In one sense he was; he was the general servant of the defendants, and at a particular moment he was the servant of Jones & Co.; he was the servant of both at the same moment, but not with regard to the same acts of service. As to the mode of working the crane he was under the sole control of Jones & Co., and he was therefore not the servant of the defendants as regards that working of the crane, whatever he might be as regards other matters. The defendants are clearly not liable for this negligence of Wand, both on principle and on authority, and I think this appeal should be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am quite of the same opinion. The action is brought for damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff through the negligent working of a crane belonging to the defendants. The crane was worked by a man named Wand, who was a servant of the defendants, and those facts give the plaintiff a clear prima facie right to bring this action. But there are some other facts to be considered. The crane was being used for the purpose of loading some barges, and Wand was working it under an arrangement which had been made between the defendants and another firm called Jones & Co. What we know about this arrangement is contained principally in the answer to the fifth interrogatory, which shows what, to my mind, is the key to the whole case, namely, the fact that Jones & Co. were the people who were loading the barges, and not the defendants. The crane was being used solely for the purpose of loading the barges; that is to say, for Jones & Co.'s purposes, not for the defendants' purposes at all. For the purpose for which the crane was being used, Jones & Co. must be regarded as the masters and employers of Wand, and not the defendants. That to my mind carries the case against the plaintiff, and brings it within the decision of the Court of Appeal in Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. (1). The Court of Appeal decided that case on what are, to my mind, sound principles; I say nothing about the judgment of the Common Pleas Division. As to Jones v. Liverpool Corpn. (3) I agree with the observations of the Master of the Rolls, though I think the decision was right.

As to the alleged joint responsibility of the defendants and Jones & Co., I think the answer may be found in the words of LITTLEDALE, J., in Laugher v. Pointer (4). He says (5 B. & C. at p. 558):

"The coachman or postillion cannot be the servant of both. He is the servant of one or the other, but not the servant of one and the other; the law does not recognise a several liability in two principals who are unconnected."

I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the law is perfectly clear, and I should be very sorry if, in consequence of the argument that has been addressed to us, the least doubt as to the law should remain in the mind of anybody. The question here is not who procured the act to be done which caused the mischief. Of course everybody is liable in law for directing a wrongful act to be done. But the liability of the defendants, if it exists at all, exists in consequence of the doctrine of the liability of a master for the act of his servant, a liability which, whatever its historic origin and development, really now is understood to involve the master in responsibility for what the servant does in his employment. We have to consider here whether, at the time the accident happened, the defendants really were the masters of the man who caused the injury to the plaintiff in the sense which such a doctrine of responsibility implies. The defendants were without doubt the general masters of Wand, but were they his masters at the time when he did the negligent act in the sense of having a power to control his acts? The point is, who was his master then, in the sense of having the right at that moment to control his acts. Whether the master was at the other end of the world or not is immaterial if he had the right at that moment of controlling what was being done.

That is the test which has been laid down clearly for the last forty or fifty years, and nowhere better than in the judgment of CROMPTON, J., in Sadler v. Henlock (5), where he says that the test is, did the defendants retain the power of controlling the work. Here the defendants certainly parted with something. They parted with the crane, and they sent a man to work it while it was being used in loading the ship. Did they retain a power of controlling the acts to be done? There are two ways in which persons who are going to carry out a work may get other independent contractors to assist them. A contractor may agree simply to carry out the work which has been indicated to him, the end being prescribed to him, but the mode of effecting the end and of controlling the means being left to him. In such a case, if he employs persons to carry out the end which has been indicated to him, those persons are his servants, because he controls their acts in attaining the prescribed end. But a contractor may make a different sort of contract. He may place his servants under the control of another person; that is to say, he may lend them for the purpose of carrying out the work indicated. In such a case he does not retain control over the servants in what is being done. For the reasons which the Master of the Rolls has given it is clear that in this case the defendants, although they placed their crane and their man at the disposal of Jones & Co., did not in the language of CROMPTON, J., retain the power of controlling the work. It was on these lines that Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. (1) was decided. The language of LORD WATSON that has been referred to is in no way inconsistent with

A the opinions in that case; it seems to me to follow exactly the same train of thought.

B The argument addressed to us has been chiefly founded upon what I may com-pendiously call the carriage cases, which really have nothing at all to do with the present case. Where a man hires a carriage of a livery-stable keeper, the owner places at the disposal of the hirer the carriage and a man to drive it. The hirer prescribes the end for which the carriage is to be used, and names the places to which the carriage is to be driven, while the owner undertakes to carry out the end which the hirer may from time to time prescribe, the owner and his servants effecting the operation, and the owner having the right to control the means. It is true that the owner undertakes that the coachman shall drive in a skilful manner, but in ordinary cases he does not place him under the orders of the hirer except for C the purpose of driving the carriage to the places indicated by the hirer. The control of the means by which the driving is accomplished is always left to the coachman, who is not subject to the orders of the hirer in the sense of being his servant. It is true that, if the coachman behaves badly or drives unskilfully, the hirer can complain to the owner, and the contract between the hirer and the owner may be broken, but the coachman does not become the servant of the hirer. If the D hirer himself takes part in the operation of driving, he does not become the master of the coachman. In such a case he would become liable for a negligent act, not because he was master of the coachman, but because he has been taking part in the wrongful act.

E The carriage cases have, therefore, nothing to do with the case we have now to decide. The truth is that, though the defendants remained the general masters of Wand, nevertheless under their contract with Jones & Co. they had parted with the right of controlling him while he was engaged in working the crane for Jones & Co.
When they parted with their power of control, their responsibility for Wand's acts which sprang from that power of control ceased, although they remained his general masters. They were no longer the masters in the sense which the law requires them to be before they can be held responsible for the negligent act.

F I quite agree with what my Lord and my brother LINDLEY have said as to there being no difference between a lending for reward and a lending not for reward, of a person to perform a work. Upon the lines upon which I have endeavoured to express my judgment it is obvious that that is a matter of no importance, the test being, as I have said, the retaining control over the acts of the servant.

By the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 132 [see now the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952, r. 130]: "Upon entering an appeal, a copy of the notice of appeal shall forthwith be sent to the registrar of the court appealed from who shall mark thereon the date when received, and forthwith file the same with the proceedings."

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 105 (4) [see now the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 109 (4)]: "Where by this Act or by general rules the time for doing any act or thing is limited, the court may extend the time . . . upon such terms, if any, as the court may think fit to impose."

Failure due to a change of their solicitors by petitioning creditors to send, in accordance with the requirements of r. 132, to the registrar of a county court a copy of their notice of appeal against a refusal by the registrar to grant a receiving order, held not to be sufficient special circumstances for the court to extend the time for compliance with the rule.

Notes. The Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, have been revoked. See now the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952. Rule 132 of the 1886 Rules has been replaced in substance by r. 130 of the 1952 Rules which provides that the copy of the notice of appeal must be sent within seven days from the entry of the appeal. Rule 389 of the 1952 Rules provides that: "The court may, for good cause shown, extend or abridge the time appointed by these Rules or fixed by an order of the court for doing any act or taking any steps in any proceedings." The general power of the court to extend time is, however, contained in s. 109 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, has been repealed. For ss. 104 (2) (d), 105 (4), and 143 (1) of that Act, see now ss. 108 (2) (c), 109 (4), and 147 (1) respectively of the 1914 Act.

B Appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division (VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and KENNEDY, JJ.), reversing a decision of the registrar of the Croydon County Court, and making a receiving order against the debtor, J. F. Vitoria, upon the petition of the Spanish Corpn., Ltd.

C In appealing from the refusal of the registrar to grant a receiving order, the petitioning creditors omitted to send a copy of their notice of appeal forthwith to the registrar in accordance with the requirements of r. 132 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, nor had they sent any such copy to the registrar at the time when this matter came before the Court of Appeal. The omission to send this copy of the notice of appeal was said to be accidental, and due to the fact that after the entry of the appeal the petitioning creditors changed their solicitors.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, it is provided :

D "Section 104 (2). Orders in bankruptcy matters shall, at the instance of any person aggrieved, be subject to appeal as follows : . . . (d) No appeal shall be entertained except in conformity with such general rules as may for the time being be in force in relation to the appeal. . . . Section 105 (4). Where by this Act or by general rules, the time for doing any act or thing is limited, the court may extend the time either before or after the expiration thereof upon such terms, if any, as the court may think fit to impose. . . . Section 143 (1). No proceeding in bankruptcy shall be invalidated by any formal defect, or by any irregularity, unless the court before which an objection is made to the proceeding is of opinion that substantial injustice has been caused by the defect or irregularity, and that the injustice cannot be remedied by any order of that court."

E Upon the hearing of the appeal before the Queen's Bench Division a preliminary objection was raised on behalf of the debtor that the appeal could not be heard by reason of the creditor's non-compliance with the requirements of r. 132. The Court held that the omission to send to the registrar a copy of the notice of appeal was a mere irregularity which had caused no injury to the debtor, and they therefore enlarged the time for compliance with r. 132, and, allowing the creditor's appeal, made the receiving order asked for. The debtor appealed.

G Jelf, Q.C., and F. Cooper Willis (Ivor Bowen with them) for the debtor.
Finlay, Q.C., and Ringwood for the creditors.

LORD HALSBURY.—I am of opinion that the preliminary objection which has been raised on behalf of the debtor is fatal to the creditors. I shall lay down no general rule in this case, but when there is a statutory regulation that

H "no appeal shall be entertained except in conformity with such general rules as may for the time being be in force in relation to the appeal,"

I and when I am asked to exercise my discretion and to enlarge the time within which under the rules an appeal must be brought, it is impossible not to see that what the legislature has given is a rule, and that it has not left the matter entirely to the discretion of the court. The court has a discretion, but the legislature has given it a criterion to guide it in exercising its discretion, and the legislature has provided that an appeal shall only be entertained when the rules as to appeals have been complied with. Even if Re Southam, Ex parte Lamb (1) had not been decided, I should have come to the same conclusion as I do now. There the Court of Appeal held that because a copy of the notice of appeal had not been sent to the registrar of the county court "forthwith" as required by r. 144 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1870, the appeal could not be heard.

In the present case special circumstances are urged, but the only excuse which has been offered is that a slip in the procedure has been accidentally made.

Yet to this hour the regulations of r. 132 have not been complied with. It would be of the worst example to lay down, as we are in fact asked to do here, that when the court is asked to enlarge the time which by statute has been limited by doing an act, it will be satisfied with an excuse of a solicitor's forgetfulness. The legislature having provided certain fixed limits of time, the interpretation which I put upon the rule is that the circumstances of the case must be something special before the court, in the exercise of its discretion, will enlarge the time. In the present case no special circumstances exist, and I am therefore of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. I cannot help thinking that the exigency of the statute and r. 132 was not really called to the attention of the Divisional Court.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree.

KAY, L.J.—I agree. I should be sorry if, in no possible case, the court were able to exercise its discretion. Section 104 (2) (d) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides that no appeal shall be entertained except in conformity with such general rules as may for the time being be in force in relation to the appeal. If the general rules are not complied with in the case of an appeal, then it is only when there are special circumstances in the case that the court can extend the time for obedience to the rules. No special circumstances are alleged here, and the appeal must therefore be allowed.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Wills and Lawrance, JJ.), May 3, 4, 1893]

Practice—Parties—Representative parties—Unincorporated association—Defendants—Two defendants authorised to defend on behalf of all persons interested—R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9.

The plaintiff, a member of a labour protection league, an unincorporated association, sued two defendants, the president and the secretary of the league, both personally as members and as representing all the members of the league, claiming to have a levy of 6d. made on each member for his benefit under a rule of the league which provided that, in case of a member being permanently incapacitated through accident while following his employment, a levy of 6d. should be made on every member of the league for his benefit. The defendants denied the plaintiff's right to sue them as representing all the members of the league.

Held: the old Chancery practice, which allowed a class of defendants to defend on behalf of the whole body of persons interested, had not been altered by R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9, under which an order might be made for the two defendants to defend on behalf of all the members; the plaintiff possessed a beneficial proprietary right under the league rule; and the two defendants were properly joined as representative defendants.

A Notes. In this case the defendants were unwilling to be joined as representative defendants and it would appear that the words "may be authorised" in R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9, have been construed as meaning "shall be directed".

Appeal by the defendants from an order of BRUCE, J., in chambers, that "the defendants be authorised to defend this action on behalf and for the benefit of all the members" of the Amalgamated Stevedores Labour Protection League.

G The plaintiff was a member of the Amalgamated Stevedores Protection League, an unincorporated and unregistered association, and while following his employment met with an accident which incapacitated him for life from following his employment. The defendants, Daniel McCarthy and Stephen Sims, were respectively president and secretary of the league and members of it. The plaintiff brought an action claiming to have a levy of 6d. made on each member of the league and the total sum paid to him in accordance with r. 27 of the league rules which provided:

"In the event of any member meeting with an accident while following his employment, and thereby being incapacitated from following his employment for the remainder of his life, a levy of 6d. each shall be made on every member of this society for his benefit. . . ."

I The plaintiff sued the two defendants "personally as representing the . . . league and executive council, and all the branches and members of the . . . league". The defendants in their individual capacity each paid 6d. into court without admitting liability and in their representative capacity denied the claim and relief sought and also the plaintiff's right to sue them as representing all the members of the league.

T. E. Crispe for the defendants.

J. Holmes Poulter for the plaintiff.

WILLS, J.—In my opinion the order made by BRUCE, J., is right. In this case an action is brought for the purpose of enforcing a contractual obligation. For a very long time past the Court of Chancery has been in the habit of allowing a class of defendants to be sued as representative of a whole body. In Bromley v. Williams (1) SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., said (32 Beav. at p. 188):

“If that be so, provided all the members of the association were made parties, then this rule is well established; that if they are so numerous that they cannot be made parties to the cause with any chance of bringing it to a hearing in consequence of abatements and the like difficulties, then you may make two or three of a class defendants to represent the interest of all that class. Formerly that was not the practice of this court, but the rules have been modified and altered so as to suit the exigencies of modern practice, as was done by LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., in several instances. But, if there be three or four classes who have separate and conflicting interests, then you may select two or three from each class to represent that interest, in the same way as if the whole class had been brought before the court.”

That case was an action brought against seven persons representative of a class of persons who had agreed to contribute in the event of a ship, that belonged to a member of the insurance club, being lost.

In principle I cannot see any distinction between that case and the case before us, and I think that that case is an authority in point. It is said that R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9, has altered this practice. I do not think that is so. R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9, provides:

“Where there are numerous persons having the same interest in one cause or matter, one or more of such persons may sue or be sued, or may be authorised by the court or a judge to defend in such cause or matter, on behalf or for the benefit of all persons so interested.”

I cannot conceive that there was any intention to narrow the doctrine which had previously prevailed, nor do I think that Temperton v. Russell (2) has had that effect, for the distinction there drawn was one between actions of contract and actions of tort. In that case LINDLEY, L.J., said ([1893] 1 Q.B. at p. 438):

“This expression only extends, we think, to persons who have or claim some beneficial proprietary right, which they are asserting or defending in the cause or matter. The plaintiff in this case sues for damages, and the action . . . is founded on tort. The old Court of Chancery had no jurisdiction to grant relief in such an action; and, although its rules as to parties to actions or suits maintainable in it have now to be applied in all divisions of the High Court when exercising the old jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, the rules ought not to be construed as creating a jurisdiction in one division, which was never exercised by any court in the country before the rules were made.”

I am of opinion that the right conferred on the plaintiff in the present case, by r. 27 of the league, to have a levy of 6d. made, is a beneficial proprietary right. I am, therefore, of opinion that the order appealed from is right and ought to be affirmed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

Ecclesiastical Law—Offence—Communion service—Mixing wine and water—Additional ceremony—Administration of mixture—Ablution after Benediction—Hymn sung before and during reception of Elements—Position of priest at beginning of service—Presence of candles on Table.

In the celebration of the Holy Communion it is not an ecclesiastical offence for the priest conducting the service (i) to administer wine with which some water has been mixed beforehand, such mixing not taking place in and as part of the service: Hebbert v. Purchas (1) (1871), L.R. 3 P.C. 605, disapproved on this point; but the mixing of water with the wine in and as part of the service would be a ceremonial act and illegal as an additional ceremony: (ii) to use excessive care in reverently consuming the remnants of the consecrated elements in the church after the Benediction and the conclusion of the service: (iii) to sing the hymn "Agnus Dei" before and during the reception of the Elements: (iv) for the priest at the beginning of the service to stand at the northern part of that side of the Communion Table which faces eastward: Ridsdale v. Clifton (2) (1877), 2 P.D. 276, explained: (v) to take part without objection in the service while lights are burning on the Holy Table at a time when they are not required for the purpose of giving light, the priest not having been a party to or a participant in the original lighting of the candles and the placing of them where they were placed.

Ecclesiastical Law—Ecclesiastical court—Proof of offence—Court satisfied that offence will not be repeated—Right to dispense with penalty.

Where an ecclesiastical court is satisfied that an ecclesiastical offence which has been proved will not be repeated, the court is entitled to accept the assurance of a future submission and is not bound to inflict a monition or other penalty.

Evidence—Contemporaneous usage—Proof by reference to historical works, pictures and documents.

Where it is important to ascertain ancient facts of a public nature the law permits historical works, pictures, and documents, to be referred to.

Privy Council—Decision—Authority—Binding effect of decision of Judicial Committee on subsequent committee.

While fully sensible of the weight to be attached to previous decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the committee are at the same time bound to examine the reasons on which the decisions rest and to give effect to their own view of the law, even though in the case before the committee there is no fact which was not under the consideration of the committee on the previous occasion.

Appeal from certain parts of a decree or judgment pronounced by the Archbishop of Canterbury in his court in a cause promoted by the appellants (members of the Church of England resident within the diocese of Lincoln) against the respondent, the bishop of the diocese of Lincoln in the province of Canterbury; see [1891] P. 9. F

Aug. 2, 1892. LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—Before dealing with any of the specific charges which are the subject of the appeal, their Lordships think it right to notice an objection raised by counsel as to the legitimacy of some of the considerations by which the archbishop was influenced in arriving at his conclusions. It has been urged that upon such subjects as the practice of the Primitive Church, the ritual of the Eastern and Western Churches, the position of the Lord's Table, the position of the celebrant at the table, and like questions, which are ex hypothesi beyond the reach of living memory, the archbishop has consulted ancient authors, historical and theological works, pictures, engravings, and a variety of documents, of which undoubtedly any careful and competent historian would avail himself, but which, it is argued, cannot legitimately be made use of in a court of justice, and upon which it is said no judge is justified in placing any reliance in forming his judgment. H

Where the objection is of so general a character it is impossible to do more than apply to it a general treatment. The first observation that arises is that if our law were to exclude all such historical investigation as is pointed to by the objection, and questions of ritual and ecclesiastical practice could only be investigated by the light of the words of an Act of Parliament some centuries old, I

A and by the testimony of living witnesses, it would disclose a very unreasonable and unsatisfactory state of the law. Who can doubt that contemporaneous usage would be of incalculable value in forming a judgment on such subjects as are indicated above? And if no historical investigation can be permitted as to what was the contemporaneous usage, one source of light upon doubtful questions would be excluded. The novelty of the objection urged before this Board is not

B a conclusive consideration, since the fact that an objection has not previously been taken is by no means conclusive against its validity when actually taken; but one cannot fail to be struck by the absence of any such objection in, e.g., Ridsdale v. Clifton (2), where, not by counsel only, but in the judgment ultimately pronounced, such authorities as HOOKER, BAXTER'S LIFE AND TIMES, COLLIER'S ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY, DR. THOMAS BENNETT'S PARAPHRASE, COSIN'S WORKS,

C and the like, were quoted and relied upon; and this not upon questions of doctrine or opinion, but as leading to inferences of fact of what was usual at the time of the writers referred to.

But their Lordships are of opinion that the objection is founded upon an erroneous view of the law. Where it is important to ascertain ancient facts of a public nature, the law does permit historical works to be referred to. The

D House of Lords, upon the impeachment of Warren Hastings, having first determined that it would only proceed upon judicial evidence such as would be receivable in a court of law, received in evidence (being advised, it will be remembered, by the judges) CANTEMIR'S HISTORY OF THE TURKISH EMPIRE. In the St. Katherine's Hospital Case (3), LORD HALE admitted SPEED'S CHRONICLES to be evidence of a particular point of history in Edward III's time, and PEMBERTON, C.J., received

E the same evidence to prove the death of Isabel, Queen Dowager of Edward II, and said he knew not what better proof could be given. Without considering further how far an ecclesiastical judge has a right to act upon his own historical learning when it becomes important to ascertain what was the ecclesiastical practice, or what were the views entertained by eminent theologians in remote times, it is enough to say here, dealing with the objection generally, that it is

F impossible to contend that, if in other respects the archbishop's judgment was well founded, it could be invalidated by his having called to his aid for this purpose his own historical researches. Nor does it make the objection better that, instead of pronouncing ex cathedra what, in his opinion, was the history of such and such a practice, the archbishop has disclosed in his judgment the sources from which he derived his views.

G With respect to some of the matters which have been the subject of debate in this appeal, it has been strongly argued that they have been conclusively determined by this Board, and that, if the facts are found to be the same, no further argument is permissible. That question was raised in Ridsdale v. Clifton (2). Some of the points in issue in that case had been already the subject of decision by the Judicial Committee in Hebbert v. Purchas (1). In answer to the argument

H that they had been conclusively settled and were no longer open to discussion, LORD CAIRNS, in delivering the judgment of the committee, said (2 P.D. at pp. 305-307):

"Their Lordships have had to consider, in the first place, how far, in a case such as the present, a previous decision of this tribunal between other parties, and an order of the Sovereign in Council founded thereon, should be

I held to be conclusive in all similar cases subsequently coming before them. . . . In the case of decisions of final courts of appeal on questions of law affecting civil rights, especially rights of property, there are strong reasons for holding the decisions, as a general rule, to be final as to third parties. . . . Even as to such decisions it would perhaps be difficult to say that they were, as to third parties, under all circumstances and in all cases absolutely final, but they certainly ought not to be re-opened without the very greatest hesitation. Their Lordships are fully sensible of the importance of establishing and maintaining, as far as possible, a clear and unvarying interpretation of rules, the stringency and effect of which ought to be easily ascertained and understood by every clerk before his admission to holy orders. On the other hand, there are not, in cases of this description, any rights to the possession of property which can be supposed to have arisen by the course of previous decisions; and in proceedings which may come to assume a penal form, a tribunal, even of last resort, ought to be slow to exclude any fresh light which may be brought to bear upon the subject."

It was argued for the appellants that the doctrine thus laid down in Ridsdale v. Clifton (2) was only applicable where there was some "fresh light," and that by this was meant some fact which had not been under the consideration of the tribunal on the previous occasion. But an examination of the arguments and judgment shows that this was not the meaning of the committee. They entered upon an elaborate and independent examination of the law bearing upon the legality of acts already pronounced illegal, and it was expressly stated, as their Lordships' conclusion,

"that, although very great weight ought to be given to the decision in Hebbert v. Purchas (1), yet they ought in the present case to hold themselves at liberty to examine the reasons upon which that decision was arrived at, and, if they should feel themselves forced to dissent from those reasons, to decide upon their own view of the law."

In the result, their Lordships dissented upon one point from the reasoning of the previous committee, and came to the conclusion that an act was lawful which had been previously pronounced illegal. In the present case their Lordships cannot but adopt the view expressed in Ridsdale v. Clifton (2) as to the effect of previous decisions. While fully sensible of the weight to be attached to such decisions, their Lordships are at the same time bound to examine the reasons upon which the decisions rest, and to give effect to their own view of the law.

The first matter dealt with by the archbishop is that contained in the 4th article. That article when read with the 13th and 14th articles, seems to contain, as the archbishop points out, two heads of charge. First, the mixing of the cup during the Communion service; and, second, the consecration and administration of the mixed cup. With the former of these their Lordships need not concern themselves. The finding of the archbishop on this part of the charge was adverse to the respondent, and no question as to the legality of this act arises upon this appeal. As regards the latter head of charge, however, the archbishop declared that the act of consecrating wine which had been mixed with water before the service, and of administering the same when so mixed to the communicants, would not be offences against the ecclesiastical law of England. The appellants impeach this declaration, and ask their Lordships to pronounce the use of wine mixed with water in the administration of the Lord's Supper to be an ecclesiastical offence. The ceremonial mixing of the cup as part of the service is no longer in question; all that their Lordships have to consider is whether the mere supply of wine which had some water in it, and the consecration and administration thereof in the Holy Communion, is a violation of the ecclesiastical law.

It is argued that the Prayer Book directs that "wine" is to be used for the purpose of the Sacrament, and that the rubric is not complied with if any water has been added to the wine which is so used. The argument must necessarily go the length of asserting that what is in that case consecrated and administered is not "wine." It is difficult to contend that what is generally called and known as "wine" loses that character by the admixture of a little water. Wines differ in alcoholic strength, and their Lordships do not believe that anyone would hesitate to apply the word "wine" to such a mixture, or that it would be an unnatural use of language to do so. The responsive plea states that "a little

A water" was added, and it is not suggested that there was such an admixture as to cause the wine to lose its distinctive character as wine. It is to be observed that the word "wine" is applied in King Edward's first Prayer Book to the mixture of wine and water which that Prayer Book enjoined, and, in the absence of any liturgical direction as to the alcoholic strength of the wine, their Lordships cannot think that the mere use of the word "wine" in the rubric by implication prohibited the presence of water in that which is consecrated and administered.

B Their Lordships, after carefully weighing what was said in Hebbert v. Purchas (1), are unable to see anything in the references to "wine" in any part of the rubrics inconsistent with this view. LORD HATHERLEY, in delivering the judgment of this committee in Hebbert v. Purchas (1), said that since it had been decided that the act of mingling wine with water in the service with a view to its administration is one of the additional ceremonies excluded by implication by the service for the Holy Communion, the question was whether the doing of the act before the service, and in the vestry or elsewhere, could so alter the symbolical character of the act that the cup might be brought in and consecrated and administered to the people without constituting an innovation or additional ceremonial act beyond what is ordered in the service; and, after stating that whatever the admixture of water symbolised, it could scarcely be said that the reception of the mingled chalice had no share in this symbolism, but only the act of mingling, concluded that if the mingling and administering in the service water and wine was an additional ceremony, and so unlawful, it did not become lawful by removing from the service the act of mingling, but keeping the mingled cup itself and administering it.

E Their Lordships find themselves unable to concur in this reasoning. The mixing of water with the wine in and as part of the service is no doubt a ceremonial act, and there can be as little doubt that, if so, it is an additional ceremony, quite apart from any particular idea as to its symbolic character which may induce the act. But where the chalice is placed mixed upon the Holy Table no act is done during the service in addition to those prescribed; the acts of consecration and administration are precisely the same as if the chalice were unmixed, and the recipients may even well be ignorant whether the chalice be mixed or not. It seems to their Lordships that there is not in such a case any additional ceremony, that no ceremonial act is added to the service. The "removing from the service the act of mingling," which the judgment in Hebbert v. Purchas (1) treated as of no moment, is the removal of the very thing which as an added ceremony was unlawful. If wine, with a small admixture of water, be "wine" within the meaning of the rubric, and if the use of it does not involve an added ceremony, their Lordships cannot but agree with the archbishop that it does not become unlawful on account of any symbolism which has been attached to the use of the mixed chalice. The practice cannot be said to have received any general agreed or definite symbolical meaning at any period of the Church's history. And, indeed, the use of the mixed chalice, because Christ himself is believed to have administered wine mingled with water, cannot with propriety be said to be a symbolical use of it, and yet this is the ground on which many have both advocated and defended the practice.

I The use of the mixed chalice in primitive times is not denied. In mixing water with the Sacramental wine the early Christians, in all probability, merely followed the practice which prevailed at that period, when, according to the ordinary usage, wine was not taken without some admixture of water, and when in ordinary parlance the word δίνος was understood to include wine and water. PLUTARCH, writing at a period not very far removed from the time of the institution of the Lord's Supper, uses the phrase—τὸ κρᾶμα καὶ τοῖς ὕδατος μέτεχον πλείονος ὕνιον καλοῦμεν. It is to be observed, however, that in the narrative of each of the Gospel accounts of the institution itself, the word "wine" does not occur, but cup (ποτήριον), as also in St. Paul's reference to it in the First Epistle to the Corinthians. There appear to have been three stages in the practice of the Church—at one time simple mixture of the wine with water; then there appears to have been instituted an additional ceremony in which there was a ceremonial admixture, but separate from the service; and then in later times an incorporation of the ceremonial admixture into the administration itself. It was to the latter, which was in use in their time, that the attention of our Reformers was directed, and which they certainly intended to exclude. Their Lordships consider that the archbishop accurately states the law when he says that the mixing of the wine in and as part of the service is against the law of the Church, but that the use of a cup mixed beforehand does not constitute an ecclesiastical offence.

The charge in the 8th and 12th articles seems to resolve itself into a question of fact. It is not denied, but is impliedly admitted by the bishop, that anything like the ceremony of ablution would be illegal. The time at which the act was done is by the appellants themselves stated to have been after the Benediction, when, according to all ordinary understanding, as well as upon the true construction of the rubric, the service is at an end. The act itself is described by the bishop as having been done with the intention of complying with the direction of the rubric, reverently to consume what remained of the consecrated elements. Even if their Lordships should be of opinion that, in the honest desire to comply with the direction in question, the bishop exhibited excessive care and scruple in the mode in which he performed the prescribed duty, that certainly could not be construed to be an ecclesiastical offence. The drink of what the witness called to prove the facts describes as the "rinsings" does not suggest any ceremony, and their Lordships cannot think that what was done was intended to be anything but what it is alleged to have been—namely, a reverent consumption of the remnants of the consecrated elements in accordance with the Book of Common Prayer—or that there is any reason to regard it as an additional, and, therefore, unlawful, ceremony. The appeal on this point, therefore, fails.

The 6th article and the responsive plea taken together establish that it was with the bishop's sanction that the hymn known as the "Agnus" was sung by the choir. The hymn, which was sung in English, consists of words taken out of the Bible, and, unless there be something to make the singing of that particular hymn at the time alleged in the charge [before the reception of the Elements and immediately after the reading of the Prayer of Consecration] unlawful, the argument must go to the full extent of making all hymns or psalms sung during the service in the English Church an unlawful addition to such service. With respect to this charge, the archbishop states that it was not contended before him that it is illegal to use a hymn or anthem in all places in the service where its use may not have been ordered, and practically the same concession was made here. It would, indeed, be difficult to maintain, in the face of usage ever since the passing of the Act of Uniformity, that singing a hymn at all during the service was in itself illegal. The careful research of the archbishop has established, as far as historical evidence can establish anything, that during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the practice was common, and it has undoubtedly continued to our own time. Such universal and unbroken usage is of great force, and it would, in their Lordships' opinion, be impossible now to contend that in itself, and apart from any interference with the due order of the service or anything objectionable in the hymn sung, the practice is illegal. Whether the origin of the usage is the permission given by the Act of Uniformity

"to use openly any psalms or prayer taken out of the Bible at any due time, not letting or omitting thereby the service or any part thereof mentioned in the said book," it is immaterial now to inquire.

The charge is that the hymn was sung "before the reception of the Elements." This is admitted in the responsive plea; but the archbishop did not understand it as alleging that the celebrant waited till the end of the hymn before he and others received the Elements. No evidence was given on the point, and the

A archbishop's construction was not questioned before their Lordships. No case of "letting" any part of the service, therefore, was made out against the respondent. With reference to the provision in the statute that the psalms must be used at a "due time," it is noteworthy that the HYMNS AND SONGS OF THE CHURCH, by WITHER, licensed by James I and Charles I in succession, should contain, in connection with a hymn inserted therein, a statement that:

B "We have a custom among us that, during the time of administering the Blessed Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, there is some psalm or hymn sung the better to keep the thoughts of the communicants from wandering after vain objects."

C Considering the ordinary mode in which the Sacrament is administered to each communicant, and the number who may either have received or be waiting to receive the Elements, their Lordships cannot differ from the archbishop that it was a "due time" for singing a hymn. If hymns and anthems are lawful at this point in the service, it cannot be said that the "Agnus Dei" is otherwise than appropriate. Although the words are not in their combination taken out of Scripture, they combine two separate passages of Scripture, and are found in more places than one in the Book of Common Prayer. They have direct reference to the great event commemorated in the Sacrament, and they are not likely to be abused to any kind of idolatrous adoration except by those who would make for themselves other opportunities for it. It is quite true that they were omitted from this part of the service in 1552, but other omissions were made at the same time which it was not suggested could have any doctrinal significance.

E The ninth charge is founded upon an alleged disobedience to that part of the rubric prefixed to the Communion service, which is in these words:

F "The table, at the Communion time having a fair white linen cloth upon it, shall stand in the body of the church, or in the chancel where Morning and Evening Prayer are appointed to be said. And the priest, standing at the north side of the table, shall say the Lord's Prayer with the collect following, the people kneeling."

The charge as formulated sufficiently shows what is intended to be charged as illegal, though it is true, as pointed out by the archbishop, that the particular illegality is not definitely stated. The words at the end of the ninth charge, "and not on the north side thereof," sufficiently show what the pleading meant —i.e., that the standing on the west side of the table during the whole of that part of the service which intervenes between its commencement and the ordering of the bread and wine before the Prayer of Consecration is illegal, and an offence against the Act of Uniformity.

G Before discussing the matter in its relation to the express words of the rubric, their Lordships cannot forbear from observing that it is impossible to assign to the directions in the rubric any meaning, either positively or negatively, which touches matters of doctrine. Whatever the position of the priest may be, it is the same whether there is or is not a celebration of the Lord's Supper; and the rubric, immediately before the Prayer for the Church Militant, shows that what is described as the Communion service may be used—at least, that the part of it down to the end of that prayer may be used—without the celebration of the Lord's Supper at all. This is also plain from the first rubric at the end of the entire service. The question is, therefore, by the form of the charge, whether the position of the respondent on the occasion to which the charge relates constituted an ecclesiastical offence. It is difficult to understand the importance which has been attached by the appellants to the position of the priest during the early part of the Communion service. It appears to be suggested that the eastward position at the Holy Table is significant of the act of the priest being a sacrificial one. The archbishop has pointed out that, in his opinion, this view is erroneous; but, quite apart from this, if there be any such significance in the position of the officiating priest, and if the intention of those who framed the rubrics now in force was to prohibit a position which could be interpreted as indicating a sacrificial act, it is obvious that the prohibition would have been specially aimed at the position during the consecration of the Elements. Yet it has been decided by this committee, and the appellants did not seek to impeach the decision, that the celebrant may at that time stand at the middle of the table facing eastwards. If this be lawful, of what importance can it be to insist that he shall during the two prayers with which the service commences place himself at that part of the table which faces towards the north?

This is all that is now in controversy. The point at issue has been sometimes stated to be whether the eastward position is lawful, but this is scarcely accurate. Even if the contention that the priest must stand at that part of the table which faces northward were well founded, there is nothing to make his saying the Lord's Prayer and the opening collect with his face eastward unlawful; the only question is whether he can lawfully do so when occupying a position near the north corner of the west side of the table. Of what moment is it, or can it ever have been, to insist that he should, during the two prayers with which the service commences, place himself at that part of the table which faces towards the north, if it be lawful to stand at the middle of the table facing eastward during the Prayer of Consecration? The very necessity of occupying the position which it is contended is alone legal during the early part of the service would serve to emphasise the subsequent change of position, and to render the position assumed at the time the Elements are consecrated the more significant.

In their Lordships' opinion there can be no doubt that, at the period when the rubric in question was framed, the table was, at the time of the Holy Communion, placed in almost all parish churches lengthwise in the body of the church or chancel, the smaller sides or ends facing east and west, and the longer sides north and south, when the church stood, as it ordinarily did, east and west; and there can be as little doubt that the rubric was framed with reference to this position of the table. While the table stood in this position, and the priest could comply conveniently with all the directions of the rubrics, without assuming a position at any part of the table other than that prescribed at the commencement of the service, there would be no reason for any change of position. When at a later period the Holy Table came to be placed what has been termed altarwise, a controversy unquestionably arose as to the manner in which the rubric ought to be complied with. Those who were in favour of the change to the altarwise position insisted that the rubric was complied with if the priest stood at the north end or side of the table. The Puritan party, on the other hand, who objected to the change, insisted that it rendered compliance with the directions of the rubric impossible, inasmuch as the priest could not stand on the north side of the table, neither of the "sides," according to their view, facing the north. This controversy was still being carried on when the Prayer Book now in use came into force, but the rubric prescribing the position of the priest at the commencement of the Communion service was left unaltered in its terms, and no attempt was made to solve the controversy. Subsequently to this period the position at the north end or side of the table appears to have become the common, though not, perhaps, absolutely the universal, one, there being reason to believe that a position at the northern side of that part of the table which faces eastwards was sometimes assumed.

When the question came to be discussed before this Board in Ridsdale v. Clifton (2), Dr. Stephens, the leading counsel who appeared for the promoters of the suit, still argued that the Acts of Uniformity required that at Communion time the Lord's Table should stand with its ends east and west, thus providing a side to the north at which the priest is to stand and officiate. It is to be observed that the only question which had to be decided, either in Hebbert v. Purchas (1) or Ridsdale v. Clifton (2), was whether the clergymen against whom these suits were brought had occupied an unlawful position by standing at the

A middle of the west side of the Communion Table while saying the Prayer of Consecration. It is true that opinions were expressed as to the position which it was the duty of the clergyman to occupy during the earlier part of the service. But these expressions of opinion were dicta not necessary for the decision of either of those cases, in which opposite views were taken as to the legality of the position occupied during the Prayer of Consecration. The question whether

B it is an ecclesiastical offence to stand while saying the two prayers with which the service commences elsewhere than at the north end had not then to be determined, and it must be remembered that the observations in the judgment in Ridsdale v. Clifton (2) were, in some measure at least, directed to the argument, to which reference has been made, that the table must, during the administration of the Communion, stand lengthwise east and west. Their Lordships, in Ridsdale v. Clifton (2), expressed the opinion that where the minister is directed to stand at the north side of the table, it is his duty to stand at the side of the table which, supposing the church to be built in the ordinary eastward position, would be next the north, whether that side be a longer or shorter side of the table.

It will be observed that, although the only direction in the rubric has reference

D to a particular point of the compass, their Lordships did not consider that the obligation to stand at the commencement of the Communion service facing southwards was absolute. They interpreted the rubric with reference to the fact that churches, at the time the rubric was framed, generally stood east to west. It seems equally legitimate to have regard to the usual position of the table as having been then in contemplation, and there can be, as has been pointed out,

E no doubt that this was lengthwise in the body of the church, the ends facing east and west. It is true that a quadrilateral, whatever its form, is rightly described as having four sides, and the word "side" may without impropriety be applied to each of them. But it is obvious, from the arguments which were common at the time when the table began to be placed in what has been called the altarwise position, that the word "end" was then, as now, more usually

F employed than the word "side" to describe the shorter sides of the quadrilateral.

Their Lordships are of opinion that, even assuming that what would be more commonly spoken of as "ends" may properly be called "sides," yet where a position at the "north side" was enjoined by the rubric, one of the longer sides of the table was in contemplation, and it was also in contemplation that all the acts prescribed which were to be done at the table should be done at that

G side. When the terms of the rubric are considered in connection with the circumstances existing at the time it was framed, their Lordships consider that it cannot be regarded as so definitely and unequivocally enjoining that the priest shall, no matter how the table may be placed, stand at that end of the table which faces the north when saying the opening prayers, that no other position can be assumed without the commission of an ecclesiastical offence. They

H cannot think that it renders it obligatory on a clergyman who thinks it desirable during the Prayer of Consecration to stand at the side of the table which now ordinarily faces eastward to stand during the earlier part of the service at a different part of the table. Their Lordships are not to be understood as indicating an opinion that it would be contrary to the law to occupy a position at the north end of the table when saying the opening prayers. All that they determine

I is that it is not an ecclesiastical offence to stand at the northern part of the side which faces eastwards.

In dealing with the charge relating to lighted candles on the Communion Table, it becomes necessary to consider with care the allegations actually made and the proofs in reference to the allegations. The offence is alleged to have taken place in the church of St. Peter-at-Gowts on Dec. 4, 1887, and the charge in the 3rd article is that the bishop,

"when officiating as bishop and the principal celebrant in the service for the administration of the Holy Communion in the same church used, and permitted to be used, lighted candles on the Communion Table, or on a ledge immediately over the said table so constructed as to appear to form part of the said Communion Table, during such service as a matter of ceremony, and when such lighted candles were not required for the purpose of giving light."

The 13th article alleges :

"That the use of the lighted candles . . . [is an] unlawful addition and variation from the form and order prescribed . . . by the said statutes, and of the order of the administration of the Holy Communion . . . and . . . contrary to the said statutes and to the rubrics . . . and to the . . . canons."

The responsive plea of the bishop is that

"throughout the celebration there were, without any objection being raised by him, two lighted candles on the Holy Table. These lights, whether required for the purpose of giving light or no, are, in his judgment, and he submits, lawful."

All that is here admitted is that two candles were, without objection on the part of the bishop, alight throughout the celebration on the Holy Table, and the only fact added by the proof was that they were not required for the purpose of giving light. The allegation that the candles were used as a matter of ceremony is an essential averment in any view of the offence indicated by the charge. It is not charged that there was any act of lighting or carrying lights about, nor was there any evidence of their use as a matter of ceremony, unless it be afforded by the mere fact that they were alight during the Communion service. If the proof corresponded with the allegation in all respects it would be matter for grave consideration how far the archbishop's elaborate exposition of the history of the question, and in particular the decision of two learned judges in 1628 and 1629, have afforded new materials for consideration since the decision of this Board in Martin v. Mackonochie (4) upon the same subject, but their Lordships are unable to see that the charge against the bishop raises the same question.

The charge against Mr. Mackonochie, who was himself responsible for the arrangement of the service and for the ornaments in his church, was presented under two aspects, and this Board dealt with both—the ceremonial lighting and burning of the candles when light was not required, and the placing and keeping the candles as unlawful ornaments on the Lord's Table. It is important to bear in mind the commentary made in that case upon the utterance of the Council of Trent, De Missæ Ceremoniis et Ritibus: "Cerimonias item adhibuit ut mysticas benedictiones, lumina, thymiamata, vestes, aliaque multa." In commenting upon this it was said by this Board (L.R. 2 P.C. at pp. 387, 388):

"There is a clear and obvious distinction between the presence in the church of things inert and unused and the active use of the same things as a part of the administration of a sacrament or of a ceremony. Incense, water, a banner, a torch, a candle and candlestick may be part of the furniture or ornaments of a church, but the censuring of persons and things, or, as was said by the Dean of the Arches, the bringing in incense at the beginning or during the celebration, and removing it at the close of the celebration of the Eucharist; the symbolical use of water in baptism, or its ceremonial mixing with the sacramental wine; the waving or carrying the banner, the lighting, cremation, and symbolical use of the torch or candle; these acts give a life and meaning to what is otherwise inexpressive, and the act must be justified, if at all, as part of a ceremonial law."

Their Lordships are not able to attach any definite meaning to the phrase that the respondent was officiating as bishop. If it is sought to be argued that his position as bishop made any difference in his responsibility from that which

A would attach to any other clergyman not being the incumbent, their Lordships are not prepared to adopt such a view. The act of lighting candles or keeping them alight, the placing or maintaining ornaments, are all things for which the incumbent of the church is himself responsible, and their Lordships in Martin v. Mackonochie (4) felt themselves compelled to deal with the questions whether there had been a ceremonial use of the lights and whether unlawful ornaments had been in use. It was on the latter ground mainly that the judgment against the respondent was rested. No such question arises here; the bishop is not charged, and manifestly could not be, with introducing unlawful ornaments. If he had disapproved of the existence of the lights where they were placed he would have had no power to remove them; and, where no act of lighting, cremation, or actual use is proved, it is impossible to say that the ecclesiastical offence has been established of using a ceremony not retained, and, therefore, prohibited, by the Act of Uniformity, unless the mere fact that the bishop took part in the consecration and administration of the Elements while the lights were burning constituted of itself the use by him of such a ceremony. No act was done by the bishop which conveyed, or was calculated to convey, to the minds of those present any different idea from that which would have been conveyed had the lights been absent.

Their Lordships are not prepared to hold that a clergyman who takes any part in the celebration of Divine service in a church in which unlawful ornaments are present necessarily uses them as a matter of ceremony. Doubtless acts done by a person primarily responsible may be so aided and assisted by others that the persons thus aiding and assisting become parties to the transaction and as guilty as the principal; but no such case has been, in their Lordships' opinion, established here. There is no allegation or evidence that the bishop was a party to or a participant in the original lighting and placing the candles where they were placed, and the only alternative open to a clergyman under the circumstances of this case, whatever his own views, and whatever his rank in the Church, would be to refuse to join in the administration of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper to the congregation because there was a light burning when no light was necessary. Whatever view might be entertained as to the propriety of such a course being taken, their Lordships are unable to affirm that the not taking such a course makes the bishop so far responsible for the act of the incumbent in lighting and keeping alight the candles as to establish the charge contained in the 3rd article. The bishop's responsive plea, in which he submits that the existence of the two lighted candles on the table throughout the celebration is lawful, and in which he admits that he made no objection, does not add anything to the case made against him. No authority was cited to show that his not making such objection constitutes an ecclesiastical offence, and their Lordships are of opinion that it does not.

Finally, it is necessary to say that their Lordships do not concur in the suggestion made at the Bar that upon those parts of the case as regards which an ecclesiastical offence was found to be proved the archbishop was under a legal obligation to issue a monition. The promoters of a suit have, it is said, a right, where they have succeeded in establishing a breach of the law, to insist upon sentence being pronounced, even if it be only a monition not to repeat the offence. Their Lordships are of opinion that the promoters have no such right. If the archbishop has satisfied himself that the offence will not be repeated, he is entitled to accept the assurance of future submission, and is not bound to inflict a penalty, and a monition is a penalty. In the result, their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed.

Perpetuities—Gift—Gift to individual followed by executory gift to charity—Gift to charity followed by executory gift to individual.

The principle that the rule against perpetuities has no application to the transfer in a certain event of property from one charity to another does not extend to cases where an immediate gift in favour of private individuals is followed by an executory gift in favour of a charity or where an immediate gift to a charity is followed by an executory gift in favour of private individuals.

The testator by his will, dated Sept. 3, 1846, gave a certain fund to trustees on trust to establish certain parish schools and to continue them thereafter for ever. He declared that if at any time thereafter the government should establish a general system of education the trust should cease and determine and the fund should be distributed in the same way as his residuary personalty. The Elementary Education Act, 1870, first established a general system of public elementary education.

Held: on the true construction of the will there was an immediate gift to a charity in perpetuity, followed by a gift over of a future interest to the residuary legatees; as the event on which the future interest was to arise, namely the establishment of a general system of education, need not necessarily have occurred within the perpetuity period the gift over was bad.

B Adjourned Summons to determine whether certain trusts declared by the testator's will had ceased and determined and whether the trust money should fall into residue.

The Rev. Daniel Bowen, by his will, dated Sept. 3, 1846, made charitable bequests in the following form :

C "And whereas I am desirous of establishing Welsh day schools in the said several parishes of Llandissil, Llanwenog, and Llanllwny, to be respectively called the Waun Ifor Charity School. I do, therefore, for the purpose of effecting my intentions, bequeath unto Delme Scymour Davies, John William Lewis, John Lloyd Davies, John Walters Philipps, David Thomas Bowen Davies, the Very Rev. Llewelyn Llewellyn, and the Rev. Thomas Lloyd, and the vicars for the time being of the said several parishes of Llandissil, Llanwenog, and Llanllwny, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for ever, the sum of one thousand and seven hundred pounds upon the trusts and for the intents and purposes following, namely, upon trust that they the said trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them and the executors, administrators, and assigns of such survivor, do and shall lay out and invest the said sum of one thousand and seven hundred pounds in the public stocks, funds of Great Britain, or real security in England or Wales, with liberty for the major part of them to change the investment at their discretion to any other of the kinds prescribed, and in the next place to establish in each of the said several parishes of Llandissil, Llanwenog, and Llanllwny a Welsh day school to be called the Waun Ifor Charity School and to continue the same schools for ever thereafter."

F After prescribing rules, regulations, and provisions for the management of the said schools, the will continued :

G "And whereas I am also desirous of establishing a Welsh day school in the parish of Whitechurch, in the county of Pembroke, to be also called the Waun Ifor Charity School, I do, therefore, for the purpose of effecting my intentions, bequeath unto Thomas Bowen, William Henry Lewis, George Bowen, and the Rev. William Bowen Harries, and the rector for the time being of the said parish of Whitechurch, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for ever, the sum of five hundred pounds upon the trusts and for the intents and purposes following, namely, upon trust that they the said trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them and the executors, administrators, and assigns of such survivor, do and shall lay out and invest the same in like manner as is provided for with respect to the trusts of the said sum of one thousand and seven hundred pounds and with the like power to change the investments, and in the next place to establish in the said parish of Whitechurch a Welsh day school to be called the Waun Ifor Charity School, subject to the same regulations, powers, and trusts as are hereinbefore declared relative to the schools to be established in the said several parishes of Llandissil, Llanwenog, and Llanllwny. And I declare that if at any time hereafter the government of this kingdom shall establish a general system of education the several trusts of the said several sums of one thousand and seven hundred pounds and five hundred pounds shall cease and determine, and I bequeath the said several sums in the same manner as I have bequeathed the residue of my personal estate."

I The will then gave a power of appointment of new trustees of the various trusts of the will, and continued :

"I appoint my sisters Jane Lloyd, Anne Walters Philipps, and Rachel Rees executrices and residuary legatees of this my will after payment of all my just debts, legacies, funeral and testamentary expenses, hereby revoking all other wills." A

The testator died on Oct. 9, 1847, and his will was duly proved on Dec. 31, 1847. Jane Lloyd died in the lifetime of the testator and Elizabeth Frances Lloyd Philipps was the sole personal representative of Anne W. Philipps and of Rachel Rees. The trustees of the said sum of £1,700 were Herbert Davies, Charles Lloyd, and the Rev. W. G. Jenkins. This was a summons taken out by the personal representative of Anne W. Philipps and Rachel Rees against the trustees of the said sum of £1,700 and the Attorney-General to determine whether the several trusts declared by the will of the testator of the said sum of £1,700 had ceased and determined, and whether such sum had fallen into residue. Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 29, 1893. STIRLING, J., read the following judgment in which after stating the facts, he continued: According to the law as stated by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in London and South Western Rail. Co. v. Gomm (1), if the gift in favour of the residuary legatees is one which is not to vest until after the expiration of, or will not necessarily vest within the period fixed and prescribed by law for the creation of future estates and interests, then the gift is bad unless the circumstance that the prior gift is in favour of a charity makes a difference. D

It has been decided that the rule against perpetuities has no application to the transfer in a certain event of property from one charity to another: see Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (2) and Re Tyler, Tyler v. Tyler (3). The principle of those decisions, however, does not extend, in my opinion, to cases where (i) an immediate gift in favour of private individuals is followed by an executory gift in favour of charity, or (ii) an immediate gift in favour of charity is followed by an executory gift in favour of private individuals. Of the former class of cases LORD SELBORNE, L.C., giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Chamberlayne v. Brockett (4) says (8 Ch. App. at p. 211): E

"If the gift in trust for charity is itself conditional upon a future and uncertain event, it is subject, in our judgment, to the same rules and principles as any other estate depending for its coming into existence upon a condition precedent. If the condition is never fulfilled, the estate never arises; if it is so remote and indefinite as to transgress the limits of time prescribed by the rules of law against perpetuities, the gift fails ab initio." F

The second class of cases does not seem to have fallen under the consideration of any court in this country; but the Supreme Court of Massachusetts has in Brattle Square Church v. Grant (5) and Theological Education Society v. A.-G. (6) held that the rule against perpetuities applies to them. For the knowledge of these decisions I am indebted to the very learned and able treatise of PROFESSOR J. C. GRAY on the RULE AGAINST PERPETUITIES (1st Edn.), s. 593, to which I was referred in argument. H

On the other hand, as property may be given to a charity in perpetuity, it may be given for any shorter period, however long; and the interest undisposed of, even if it cannot be the subject of a direct executory gift, may be left to devolve as the law prescribes. Of this an example is to be found in Re Randell, Randell v. Dixon (7), in which the head-note is as follows (38 Ch.D. at p. 213): I

"A testatrix bequeathed £14,000 on trust to pay the income to the incumbent of the church at H. for the time being so long as he permitted the sittings to be occupied free; in case payment for sittings was ever demanded, she directed the £14,000 to fall into her residue. Held, first, that the testatrix had not ex-

- A pressed a general intention to devote the £14,000 to charitable purposes, so that in case of failure of the trust for the benefit of the incumbent the fund would be applied cy-près; secondly, that the direction that the fund should fall into the residue, being a direction that the fund should go as the law would otherwise carry it, did not offend the rule against perpetuities."
- B The question which I have to decide, therefore, appears to me to reduce itself to one of the construction of the testator's will, i.e., whether the testator has given the property to charity in perpetuity, subject to an executory gift in favour of the residuary legatee, or one for a limited period, leaving the undisposed of interest to fall into residue. In construing the will the rule to be applied is that stated by LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in Pearks v. Moseley (8) (5 App. Cas. at p. 719):
- C "You do not import the law of remoteness into the construction of the instrument by which you investigate the expressed intention of the testator. You take his words and endeavour to arrive at their meaning exactly in the same manner as if there had been no such law, and as if the whole intention expressed by the words could lawfully take effect."
- D In the present case the sums of £1,700 and £500 are bequeathed to trustees who are obviously selected with a view to the efficient administration of the charitable trusts created by the will, and were not intended by the testator to be charged with any duties as regards any other portion of his property. He directs the trustees named in the will, by means of the funds paid in to them by his executors, to establish certain schools "and to continue the same schools for ever thereafter."
- E He contemplates a perpetual succession of trustees in whom the execution of the trusts is to be vested. I think that on the true construction of the will there is an immediate disposition in favour of charity in perpetuity and not for any shorter period. That is followed by a gift over if at any time the government should establish a general system of education; and under that gift over the residuary legatees take not an immediate but a future interest. As the event on which that future interest is to arise is one which need not necessarily occur within perpetuity limits, it follows that the gift over is bad; and, consequently, the summons must be dismissed.

By his will, dated 1849, the testator, a dissenting minister, after giving his residuary estate to trustees upon trust for sale, and, subject to life interests, to certain persons, proceeded as follows: “I do give and bequeath the whole of my property to the following religious societies, viz.—to be divided in equal shares among them.” When the testator executed his will, he left a blank for the names of the societies. Afterwards he inserted the names of four societies, which were not admitted to probate as part of the will.

Held: as a bequest to a religious institution or for a religious purpose was prima facie a bequest for a charitable purpose unless the contrary could be shown, the testator’s personal estate was subject to a trust for charitable purposes, and a scheme must be directed as to such part of it as was pure personality at the testator’s death.

Appeal by the Attorney-General from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., reported [1893] 2 Ch. 41, that the testator's next-of-kin were entitled to the capital of his residuary estate, there being no general charitable intent in the will.

- G By his will, dated 1849, the Rev. Ebenezer White, a Dissenting minister, gave his residuary estate to trustees upon trust for sale, and subject to successive life interests to his widow and a niece he proceeded as follows:

"I do give and bequeath the whole of my property to the following religious societies, viz.—to be divided in equal shares among them."

- H The will was written on one side of several sheets of paper fastened together book-wise, and when the testator executed it he left a blank for the names of the societies. On the sheet opposite the sheet upon which the above clause was written were the following words referring to the blank in the will which were inserted after the testator had executed his will:

- I "Viz., the Tract Society, the Home Missionary Society, the London Missionary Society, the Colonial Missionary Society."

The testator died in 1859. Upon the will being proved the court refused to admit to probate the clause specifying the names of the religious societies.

An originating summons was taken out by a legal personal representative of the testator, being also one of his next-of-kin, to have it declared that the testator died intestate as to the capital of his residuary estate; and that, subject to the life interests, the next-of-kin were entitled to such capital. On Oct. 28, 1892, the summons came on to be heard before KEKEWICH, J., who decided that there was no general intention to devote the residue to charity such as the court could execute or recognise; and that, as between the next-of-kin and the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown, the former were entitled. The Attorney-General appealed. A

Feb. 8, 1893. LINDLEY, L.J., read the following judgment of the court.—This is an appeal from the decision of KEKEWICH, J., on the will of Ebenezer White. He was a dissenting minister, and in the events which happened he left the whole of his property (subject to a life estate) C

“to the following religious charities, viz. . . . to be divided in equal shares among them.”

When the testator executed his will he left a blank for the names of the societies. After he had executed his will he put in their names, but they very properly do not appear in the probate, and the will must be construed as if the blank had never been filled up. Under these circumstances KEKEWICH, J., held that there was an intestacy. From this decision the Attorney-General has appealed, upon the ground that the testator has bequeathed his property for charitable purposes, and that a scheme for its application ought to be directed. D

If the bequest in question amounts to and ought to be construed as, a dedication by the testator of his property to charitable purposes, then there can be no doubt the Attorney-General is right. But the will says nothing in terms about charity, nor about the purposes for which the property is bequeathed. And it was urged by counsel for the next-of-kin that it was not possible to discover those purposes, except by guessing. A “religious” society may or may not be a “charitable” society in the sense in which that expression is used. A society for the promotion of private prayer and devotion by its own members, and which has no wider scope, no public element, no purposes of general utility, would be a “religious” society, but not a “charitable” one: see Cocks v. Manners (4). In that case it was held that a gift by will to a Dominican convent was not a charitable gift. WICKENS, V.-C., said (L.R. 12 Eq. at p. 585): E

“A voluntary association of women for the purpose of working out their own salvation by religious exercises and self-denial seems to me to have none of the requisites of a charitable institution, whether the word ‘charitable’ is used in its popular sense or in its legal sense.” F

The words of the testator's will are insufficient to show what kind of religious societies he meant. They may or may not have been “charitable” as well as “religious,” and, as all religious societies are not charitable, we should, in the absence of authority, be unable to come to the conclusion that “charity” was intended, and we should, therefore, be of opinion that the result was an intestacy. G

It is, however, impossible, we think, seriously to deny that the testator intended his property to be given to some religious societies for religious purposes. His property was to be divided amongst certain societies, but what for? The only rational answer to this question must, we think, be “for the purposes of those societies,” and, the societies being themselves described as “religious societies,” the purposes for which the testator gave his property must be treated as religious purposes. It is true that these are not necessarily “charitable” purposes, and in a particular case a “religious” society may be shown not to be a “charitable” society. This was the case in Cocks v. Manners (4). But the authorities show that a bequest to a religious institution, or for a religious purpose, is prima facie a bequest for a “charitable” purpose, and that the law applicable to “charitable” H

A bequests, as distinguished from the law applicable to ordinary bequests, ought to be applied to a bequest to a religious institution, or for a religious purpose.

The leading cases on this head are as follows: Baker v. Sutton (1), where the bequest was to such religious and charitable institutions and purposes as in the opinion of the trustees might be fit and proper. LORD LANGDALE, M.R., in that case said (1 Keen, at p. 233):

B "All the cases, with one exception, go to support the proposition that a religious purpose is a charitable purpose."

Townsend v. Carus (2) is to the same effect. WIGRAM, V.-C., there said (3 Hare, at p. 261):

C "If this is a bequest for religious purposes I think I am bound to hold it a charity within the decided cases."

The promotion of the spiritual welfare of mankind was the object of the testator in that case, and the Vice-Chancellor dealt with the argument that some modes of promoting such welfare might not be "charitable." Having come to the conclusion that the object of the testator was "charitable" because it was "religious," he says that no mode of carrying out his intention could be proper if that mode was not itself charitable. In Wilkinson v. Lindgren (3), where the bequest was to certain charitable institutions previously named, "or any other religious institution or purposes," as the trustees might think proper, religious purposes were treated as clearly "charitable." We can find no authority which really conflicts with these, or which is opposed to the principle on which they proceed, and we cannot, without splitting straws, distinguish this case from them.

E We come, therefore, to the conclusion—first, that the gift is for religious purposes; and, secondly, that being for religious purposes it must be treated as a gift for "charitable" purposes, unless the contrary can be shown. If once this conclusion is arrived at the rest is plain. A charitable bequest never fails for uncertainty; Mills v. Farmer (5) settles that point. LORD ELDON was clearly of opinion that the nomination of particular objects is only the mode and not the substance of a gift to "charity." We may add that, having looked at the registrar's book for the will in A.-G. v. Syderfen (6), we find that it is correctly set out in 7 Ves. 43, n. The decision appealed from must therefore be reversed, and it must be declared that, in the events which have happened, the testator's personal estate is subject to a trust for "charitable" purposes, and a scheme must be directed as to such part of it as was pure personalty at the testator's death. But, having regard to the blunder made by the testator, and the real difficulty occasioned by him, the costs of all parties, both here and below, ought to come out of his estate, subject to the life interest of the tenant for life.

SOVEREIGN LIFE ASSURANCE CO. v. DODD

[Reported [1892] 2 Q.B. 573; 62 L.J.Q.B. 19; 67 L.T. 396;
41 W.R. 4; 8 T.L.R. 684; 36 Sol. Jo. 644; 4 R. 17]

Company—Winding-up—Set-off—Mutual dealings—Action by liquidator for debt owing to company—Right of defendant to set-off debt owing by company to him.

The right of set-off in an action depends upon the existence of a debt due by the plaintiff to the defendant, and the fact that the debtor-plaintiff, if a company, is in liquidation cannot prevent the right of set-off arising, though it does prevent the defendant obtaining in the winding-up more than his share of the assets. When, therefore, an action is brought by the liquidator of a company to recover a debt due to the company the defendant can set off a debt due to him from the company.

Company—Winding-up—Scheme of arrangement—Approval by “class” of creditors—Class not to include persons with different interests—Winding-up of assurance company—Arrangement sanctioned by meeting attended by holders of matured policies and holders of policies not matured.

By s. 2 of the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, it was provided that where any compromise or arrangement was proposed between a company which was being wound-up and “the creditors of such company or any class of such creditors,” the court might order a meeting of “such creditors or class of creditors” to be called; and, if a majority of “such creditors or class of creditors” agreed thereto, such compromise or arrangement should bind “all such creditors or class of creditors,” and the liquidator and contributories. A meeting of all the policy-holders of an assurance company, which was in liquidation, was called to sanction an arrangement by which another company should make reduced payments upon the policies in satisfaction of all their claims, and a statutory majority agreed thereto. All policy-holders were called to the meeting, no distinction being made between those whose policies had, and those whose policies had not, matured.

Held: “class” in s. 2 of the Act of 1870 must be construed so as to avoid injustice being done to a minority of shareholders, and, accordingly, not to include in one class persons with different interests; the interests of persons whose policies had matured and those of persons whose policies had not matured were different; and, therefore, the decision of the meeting was not binding on the holder of a matured policy who did not attend the meeting or assent to its decision.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of CHARLES, J., at the trial of the action without a jury, reported [1892] 1 Q.B. 405.

On Feb. 5, 1879, the defendant effected with the plaintiff company two policies of assurance upon his life of £1,000 each. The amount assured was to be payable to him if he were living on May 7, 1888, or to his executors if he died before that date. Before July, 1887, the defendant borrowed from the plaintiff company two sums of £570 and £600, and secured the repayment thereof by mortgages to the secretary of the company of the two policies. On Aug. 5, 1887, a petition to wind-up the company was presented, and on Sept. 2, 1887, a provisional liquidator was appointed. The defendant paid the premiums upon the two policies up to May 7, 1888, and the amount of the policies became due to the defendant on that day. On July 30, 1889, a winding-up order was made, and on Sept. 17 a liquidator was appointed. On April 11, 1890, a deed of arrangement was entered into between the plaintiff company and the Sun Life Assurance Co. This deed provided for the payment of reduced sums by the Sun company to those policy-holders in the plaintiff company whose policies would not have matured by Aug. 4, 1890, and of a dividend out of the assets of the plaintiff company; and "as to the policies of the plaintiff company which, but for the said winding-up order, would have matured between Aug. 4, 1887, and Aug. 4, 1890," for the payment of reduced sums and a dividend out of the assets. It was also provided that,

"if this agreement is sanctioned by the court, all policy-holders of the Sovereign company who were such on Aug. 4, 1887, shall accept the provisions hereof in full satisfaction of all claims on the Sovereign company and the assets thereof."

Under the deed of arrangement, the amount payable to the defendant would be about £247 upon each policy. This deed of arrangement was made under the provisions of s. 2 of the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870. A meeting of policy-holders was summoned under this section to agree to the arrangement, but those whose policies had matured and those whose policies had not matured were all summoned to the same meeting. At this meeting a majority, representing three-fourths in value, agreed to the arrangement. The defendant was not present, and did not assent to the arrangement. The deed of arrangement was sanctioned by the court on June 14, 1890. In December, 1890, the company, by their liquidator, brought this action against the defendant to recover £1,345, the amount of the above-mentioned loans and interest. The defendant pleaded a set-off of the sum of £2,000 due and payable to him by the company in respect of the two policies which matured on May 7, 1888. CHARLES, J., held that the defendant was entitled to the set-off, and gave judgment in his favour. The plaintiffs appealed.

By the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, s. 2 [see now Companies Act, 1948, s. 206 (1) (2)]:

"Where any compromise or arrangement shall be proposed between a company which is, at the time of the passing of this Act or afterwards, in the course of being wound-up, either voluntarily, or by or under the supervision of the court under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, or either of them, and the creditors of such company, or any class of such creditors, it shall be lawful for the court, in addition to any other of its powers, on the application in a summary way of any creditor or the liquidator, to order that a meeting of such creditors or class of creditors shall be summoned in such manner as the court shall direct; and if a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of such creditors or class of creditors present either in person or by proxy at such meeting shall agree to any arrangement or compromise, such arrangement or compromise shall, if sanctioned by an order of the court, be binding on all such creditors or class of creditors, as the case may be, and also on the liquidator and contributories of the said company."

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 38 [see now Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 31] :

"Where there have been mutual credits, mutual debts, or other mutual dealings between a debtor against whom a receiving order shall be made under this Act and any other person proving or claiming to prove a debt under such receiving order, an account shall be taken of what is due from the one party to the other in respect of such mutual dealings, and the sum due from the one party shall be set off against any sum due from the other party, and the balance of the account, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively."

By s. 10 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875 [see now s. 317 of Companies Act, 1948] :

"In the winding-up of any company under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, whose assets may prove to be insufficient for the payment of its debts and liabilities, and the costs of winding-up, the same rules shall prevail and be observed as to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors, and as to debts and liabilities provable, and as to the valuation of annuities and future and contingent liabilities respectively, as may be in force for the time being under the law of bankruptcy with respect to the estates of persons adjudged bankrupt."

Buckley, Q.C., and Hull (H. Tindal Atkinson with them) for the plaintiffs.

Crump, Q.C., and Morton Smith for the defendants, were not called on to argue.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. The plaintiff company, which is in liquidation, has brought an action to recover a sum of money lent by the company to the defendant before the liquidation, and the defendant sets up as a defence a right of set-off against the company and the liquidator. To that defence the plaintiffs answer that, in the first place, the defendant has no right of set-off, and, secondly, that the claim which he seeks to set off has been released. The first question which we have to consider is: What circumstances will destroy a right of set-off which a defendant would otherwise have? When an action of debt is brought, will the fact that the plaintiff is in liquidation or a bankrupt, and the action is brought by a liquidator or trustee, of itself destroy a right of set-off and compel the defendant to prove his claim in bankruptcy?

Let us see what the rights of the parties would have been under the old law in such a case. It is suggested that, if a trustee in bankruptcy brought an action to recover a debt due to the bankrupt, and a set-off was pleaded, it would have been a good answer that the bankrupt could only pay one shilling in the pound, and that the set-off was thus reduced to one shilling in the pound. Such a thing as that, however, never was heard of. Now a set-off can only be set up when an action is brought. What is the right of a defendant after an action is brought against him? Clearly his right is to set off a debt due to him from the plaintiff if the debt due to him is of the same kind as the debt for which he is being sued. The right of set-off depends upon the existence of a debt due to the defendant, and the fact that his debtor is a bankrupt cannot prevent the right of set-off arising, though it does prevent him obtaining in the bankruptcy more than his share of the assets. The whole debt is still in existence. When, therefore, an action is brought by a trustee in bankruptcy, the defendant can set off a debt due to him from the bankrupt. What is the result of a plea of set-off? It is not a counterclaim or cross-action,

A but it is a plea in bar of the action, and, therefore, when the plea is proved, although it may be that when the action was brought the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff, yet, since the plaintiff is indebted to the defendant to the same amount, the plaintiff's claim is barred. Bankruptcy, therefore, does not make any difference in the right of set-off.

F The cases in which a debt could be set off in bankruptcy were limited, and many difficulties arose, and the subject was dealt with by the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 39, and by the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 38, which enlarged the subject-matter of set-off. These Acts, however, made no difference in the effect of a set-off, and a debt can now be treated as a set-off which could not have been so treated under the old law, and when pleaded and proved is still a bar to the action. We have, therefore, in this case to see whether, when this action was brought, the defendant had a C right to set off this debt.

When an action is brought by a company, through its liquidator, to recover a sum of money lent by the company to the defendant, the defendant may answer that he admits the claim, but that the company is indebted to him in an equal or larger amount which he has a right to set off against the claim. Was, then, the plaintiff company so indebted to the defendant when this action was brought? At D the time when the action was brought the date for the payment of these policies had arrived, and the company was, therefore, at that time indebted to the defendant who had a claim against them for the sums insured by the policies, a liquidated and ascertained amount. The company was indebted to the defendant, and the defendant to the company. The winding-up prevented the defendant from obtaining payment from the company of the amount due upon the policies, and he E could only prove in the winding-up for a dividend in respect of that amount. The winding-up, however, had no effect upon his right to plead a set-off, and he had a right to plead as a defence to this action that the plaintiff company was indebted to him in a sum of £2,000, and to claim to set that sum off against the plaintiffs' claim. It appears to me, therefore, to be clear that the defendant had a right to plead a set-off which would be a bar to the action. It is immaterial whether this F would have been a set-off before the statute (though I incline to think that it would have been), for I have no doubt that it comes within the terms of the section.

It has been argued that the decision in Re Lankester, Ex parte Price (1) is to the contrary; but that case is distinguishable, because, as was pointed out in Re Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co.; Lee and Chapman's Case (2), there was there no action at all, and the court was only considering the right of proof in bankruptcy. G In the present case it is unnecessary to consider what would have been the rights of the defendant, if there had been no action, and the proceedings had been in bankruptcy. We have only to consider the defendant's rights in this action, and in this action his set-off is so large as to bar the claim of the plaintiff company. That view is in accordance with the decision in Re Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co., Lee and Chapman's Case (2), and does not conflict with the decision in Re H Lankester, Ex parte Price (1).

The defendant is, therefore, entitled to the benefit of his set-off unless the plaintiffs can say that his debt has been released as against them, and that the debtor has consented to take, and has taken, someone else as his debtor instead of the plaintiff company. That question depends upon what was done at the meeting of creditors, and whether what was there done bound the defendant so as to I release the plaintiff company from their liability to him. For the purpose of determining this question we must look at the facts at the time when this action was brought. With regard to the meeting of creditors we must consider who were the persons to be summoned to attend it, and who are to be dealt with as different classes within the meaning of s. 2 of the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870. We must consider the position of affairs at the date of the meeting in order to see who had a right to attend it at that time, for the position of affairs at that time must be looked at for that purpose. The Act provides that the persons to be summoned to the meeting, all of whom, it is to be observed, are creditors, are persons who can be divided into different classes, classes which the Act recognises, though it does not define. The creditors, therefore, must be divided into different classes. What is the reason for prescribing such a course? It is because the creditors composing the different classes have different interests, and, therefore, if a different state of facts exists with respect to different creditors, which may affect their minds and judgments differently, they must be separated into different classes. A

In the present case the persons who were summoned to the meeting were policy-holders whose policies had to be dealt with. The defendant, however, was not a policy-holder at all. His policies had been fulfilled and he was a creditor of the company for the amount of his policies, and could have sued the company for the debt. He had then a vested cause of action; the policy-holders had not. It is clear, therefore, that he would not consider the matter with the same mind and from the same point of view as the policy-holders who were summoned to the meeting. A creditor such as the defendant was could not be said to be in the same class as the policy-holders whose policies had not matured. The defendant belonged to a different class of creditors from those persons who were summoned to the meeting as policy-holders, for his policies, being matured, had not to be dealt with in any way. What was done at that meeting did not, therefore, bind him. The learned judge at the trial was right in holding that the section applied so as to enlarge the subject-matter of a plea of set-off, and his judgment must be affirmed. As I have already intimated, I think that there would have been a set-off apart from the statute; but, if the right depends upon the statute, I entirely agree with the judgment of CHARLES, J., that the defence is open to the defendant and is a bar to the action. This appeal must be dismissed. B C D

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This was an action for money lent, and the defendant sought to defend upon the ground that as against the company he had a set-off in respect of money due to him upon policies granted to him by the company, which money became payable under the policies on May 7, 1888. At that date a petition to wind-up the company had been already presented. The defendant paid all premiums due upon the policies up to May 7, 1888; and on that day a large sum of money became due to him from the company. E

What, then, was the position of the defendant upon that day? The company was then being wound-up, for the subsequent winding-up order, when made, dated back to the presentation of the petition. The defendant was a person who had effected policies with the company and had assigned them to the company as security for a loan, and was also a person to whom the company owed £2,000. It is true that he could not successfully sue the company for that £2,000 because of the winding-up, and was only entitled to prove against the company for the value of his claim. His case, therefore, is clearly distinguished from that of the other policy-holders whose policies had not matured; his claim upon his policy had become a fixed and ascertained sum; this operated to his benefit, and the case is somewhat like Re Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co., Macfarlane's Claim (3), and Re Bridges, Hill v. Bridges (4). The defendant then had money due to the company in his pocket, and was entitled to make use of his claim against the company as a set-off against any claim which the company might make against him in respect of the loan, and as a defence to the action. He could not sue the company for the money due to him, or counterclaim that sum from them, because of the winding-up; but he could say that the transactions between them had resulted in mutual debts, and that he had a right to set off the debt due from the company to him against the debt due from him to the company. That was his position when the policies matured, and he could not be in any worse position when the company brought their action against him: he was then entitled to set up his defence of a set-off, and that set-off was so large as to be a bar to the claim of the company. F G H I

That being so, I agree with the Master of the Rolls that it is unnecessary to consider what the position of the parties would have been if there had only been

A proceedings in liquidation and no action had been brought. What is there to prevent the defendant availing himself of a set-off in this action? Certainly not the winding-up, which has not altered the position and rights of the parties in this respect. As far as I can see, this is a good set-off at law; but, even if it were not, by reason of the assignment of the policies to the secretary of the company, it would yet be a good set-off in equity. The operation of s. 39 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and of s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, has been to enlarge, not the effect of a set-off, but the meaning of the term. This appears from the decision in Re Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co. (2), and especially from the judgment of CORRON, L.J., in that case, which is cited at some length by CHARLES, J., in his judgment in the present case. It has been argued, however, that the decision in Re Lankester, Ex parte Price (1), is inconsistent with that case, and governs the present case. I am unable to agree with that argument. Re Lankester, Ex parte Price (1) dealt only with the doctrine of mutual rights in relation to the proof of a set-off in a winding-up, and not in a case where an action had been brought, and the court was dealing with the valuation of policies current at the time when the right of set-off was claimed. In the present case the policy had ceased to be current and was matured, and we have to deal with the rights of a person who is entitled to the full amount secured by his policy. There is here, therefore, either a mutual debt or a mutual dealing, and unless there had been a release of the defendant's claim against the company, they cannot succeed in this action.

The question whether there has been a release or not depends upon the construction of the deed of arrangement, and upon the effect of the statute upon that deed. I very much doubt whether the term "policy-holder" includes those persons who have been policy-holders, but whose policies have matured by the happening of the stipulated event. It is not, however, necessary for us to decide that question if we think that, under the Act of 1870, this deed of arrangement did not bind dissentient creditors. What, then, is the true construction of s. 2 of the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870? It provides that "the creditors or any class of creditors" may be called to a meeting, and that the agreement of the majority shall bind the minority; it exercises a very formidable compulsion upon dissentient, or would-be dissentient, creditors; it must consequently be construed carefully so as not to enable some creditors to compel others to do that which it would be unreasonable to require them to do, or to play with the interests of the minority. If we construe the section in the way suggested by the plaintiffs we should hold that a class of policy-holders whose interests are uncertain may, by a majority in value, override the interests of those whose rights are not uncertain but have already been ascertained. It is obvious that the interests of these two classes are inconsistent, and that those whose policies are still current are deeply interested in sacrificing the interests of those whose policies have matured. They are bound by no community of interests, and their claims are not capable of being ascertained by any common system of valuation. Are we then justified in so construing the statute as to include all these persons in one class? The word "class" used in the statute is vague, and to find out what it means we must look at the general scope of the section, which enables the court to order a meeting of a "class of creditors" to be summoned. It seems to me that we must give such a meaning to the term "class" as will prevent the section being so worked as to produce confiscation and injustice, and that we must confine its meaning to those persons whose rights are not so dissimilar as to make it impossible for them to consult together with a view to their common interest. That being so, in considering the deed of arrangement made with the company which took over the business of the plaintiff company, we must so construe it as not to include in one class those persons whose policies had already ripened into debts and those whose policies might not ripen into debts for some years. The position of a person like the defendant, to whom an ascertained sum of £2,000 was due from the company, was quite different from the position of those policy-holders whose future was entirely uncertain. It was not, therefore, right to summon to a meeting, as members of one and the same class of creditors, those who had an absolute bar to a claim by the company against them and those who had not. In my opinion, therefore, there was no release of the defendant's claim against the plaintiff company. This appeal must be dismissed. A

KAY, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The company have now brought this action to recover from the defendant the money lent to him, and the defendant claims to be entitled to a set-off in respect of the sums due upon the policies, chiefly upon the ground that the transaction amounts to a mutual credit or dealing within s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It is admitted that the company had sufficient funds to pay these policies when they matured, and the company were, therefore, then indebted to the defendant in the full amount of the policies. Re Lankester, Ex parte Price (1) is the only case which has been cited to us as an authority against the defendant's claim to a set-off in this case. There is, however, a very broad distinction between the two cases. In that case a proof was tendered by the company in the bankruptcy of the assured, and an attempt was made by the assured's trustee in bankruptcy to avail himself of the mutual credit section, because at the date of the bankruptcy the bankrupt was entitled to a current policy of the company which had not matured, that is to say, the bankrupt was indebted to the company, and tried to set off a claim which was not then due, and was in fact a claim for the value of what might become due upon the policy. In the present case, on the contrary, the claim which the defendant seeks to set off had already accrued due; it was a sum ascertained and liquidated. That is the material difference between the two cases. I do not desire in any way to dissent from the decision in Re Lankester, Ex parte Price (1), but that case is distinguishable from the present case upon the grounds which I have indicated. B C D E

This case more clearly approaches Re Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co. (2). There was a clear debt due upon these policies when this action was brought, and I think that we may disregard the argument founded upon the fact that there had been an assignment of the policies to a trustee for the company, for there will be an equitable set-off in cases where, but for such a circumstance as this assignment, there would have been a good legal set-off. The company were liable to the defendant for the amount of the policies, subject, indeed, to their charge thereon for the loan to the defendant, and I think that the defendant probably had a right of set-off against the company, wholly independent of s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. If, however, he had not, it is clear that there was a mutual dealing between the company and the defendant which entitled the defendant to have the accounts taken between them, and to bring in his claim against them under the mutual credit clause. F G

Then comes the question under the deed of arrangement, which makes provision for the liquidation of current policies, and, in cl. 2, provides for policies "which, but for the said winding-up order, would have matured between Aug. 4, 1887, and Aug. 4, 1890." The expression "would have matured" is a loose one, and does not seem to apply to a case where the policy has matured on a fixed date which the assured has outlived. Then, by cl. 11, all policy-holders who were policy-holders on Aug. 4, 1887, are to accept the provisions of the deed in full satisfaction of their claims upon the plaintiff company. Without deciding whether this clause is binding upon any particular policy-holder, I am not satisfied that it amounts to a release of the defendant's claim upon the company. He asserts a right to set off his claim against that of the company, and I think that it cannot be contended that cl. 11 operates to deprive a person of an existing right of set-off. As the defendant had an existing right of set-off, I do not think that this clause applies to prevent him availing himself of that right in this action. I agree also that it is very doubtful whether this deed relates at all to a policy-holder in the position of the defendant. There never was a separate meeting of the class of policy-holders to which he belonged, and he ought not to have been mixed with those whose policies had not yet matured. It is admitted that his policies had matured, and H I

A that the sum secured by them was due and payable. The defendant, therefore, had a right to set off that sum in order to liquidate the debt due from him to the company, and this deed of arrangement cannot be treated as a release by him of the debt due from the company. This appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Perpetuities—Will—Conditional gift—Gift over—Limitation on failure of issue with reference to issue taking under prior gift—Several events possible—Splitting of gift over.

E By his will a testator directed that a one-fifth share of his real and personal estate should be held on trust to pay the income therefrom to his daughter M. for life and on her death (by reference to a prior gift) on trust for such of her child or children as should attain twenty-one or being a daughter or daughters attain that age or marry, and also such child or children of any son or daughter of M. who might die under twenty-one as should live to attain twenty-one or being a daughter marry, in equal shares per stirpes. Having settled the four other one-fifth shares on each of his four other children, the testator directed that, if any of his children should die without leaving issue who should live to attain a vested interest in their respective shares, then the share or shares as to which such failure of issue should happen should be held on trust for such of his children as should be living at the time of such failure of issue and the issue of such of them as might be dead equally as tenants in common. M. was married, but died without having had any issue.

F Held: the gift over on the death of M. was a single gift which could not be split into as many separate gifts over as the number of possible events which the language included so as to be held good or bad as the events happened within or beyond the limits of the rule against perpetuities; and, whether regarded as an equitable contingent remainder or as an executory devise, the gift over was void for remoteness and transgressed the rule against perpetuities.

Appeal from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., on an originating summons taken out by the trustees of the will of the testator, William Bence, concerning the administration of the trusts contained therein to determine: (i) whether and how far the limitations in the will of the one-fifth share and one-fourth of another one-fifth share of the real and personal estate of the testator given upon trust for his daughter, Maria Ruetta, for life and to take effect after her death were valid; (ii) who were then entitled to the one-fifth share and one-fourth of another one-fifth share of the real estate and residuary personal estate respectively of the testator, and in what shares and proportions, and for what estates and interests therein respectively. KEKEWICH, J., held that the limitations as to the original and accrued shares of Maria Ruetta were void for remoteness. G

By his will dated Oct. 11, 1855, the testator, William Bence, gave his freehold, copyhold, or customary and leasehold estates and the residue of his personal estate to trustees upon certain trusts for his wife for life and after her death, the testator directed the trustees to stand possessed of all the trust estates and premises, as to one-fifth part, in trust to pay the income to his son William Henry, for life, and from and after his death, H

"upon trust to convey, assign, and pay the . . . one-fifth part of the . . . estate and premises unto and among such child or children of my son William Henry . . . as shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters shall live to attain that age or be married, and also such child or children of any son or daughter of . . . William Henry . . . who may die under the age of twenty-one years as shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter to be married, in equal shares and proportions per stirpes and not per capita, and in default or failure of the I

A issue of . . . William Henry . . . then the . . . one-fifth share shall be in trust for all my other children or their issue, in equal shares and proportions as tenants in common, per stirpes and not per capita."

As to another fifth part of the trust estate the testator directed his trustees to convey it to his younger son John Frederick absolutely. As to another fifth part the testator directed his trustees to pay the income to his daughter Maria Ruetta for life for her separate use with restraint on anticipation.

B "And from and after the decease of my . . . daughter, the same fifth part of the . . . estates and premises shall be in trust for her children or more remote issue in like manner as is hereinbefore declared with respect to the children of my son William Henry. . . ."

C The testator directed trusts of two other fifth parts of the estate for his daughters Ellen Amelia and Victoria Louisa and their issue with like limitations as in the case of Maria Ruetta. The testator then declared that:

D "if any or either of them . . . William Henry . . . , Maria Ruetta . . . , Ellen Amelia . . . , and Victoria Louisa . . . , shall depart from this life without leaving any lawful issue who shall live to attain a vested interest in their respective shares of the . . . trust estate and premises, then the share or shares as to which such failure of issue shall happen shall remain and be in trust for such other or others of my children as shall be living at the time of such failure of issue, and the issue then living of such of them as may be then dead equally as tenants in common, and in the same and the like manner as nearly as may be as is directed with regard to their original share or shares of my . . . trust estates and premises."

E The testator died on Mar. 18, 1857, and his widow died on Dec. 9, 1871, and letters of administration were granted to the testator's younger son, the defendant John Frederick. William Henry, the testator's heir-at-law, was lost at sea in 1885. He left no issue, and by his will gave all his real and personal estate to his wife, the defendant Susanna Shepherd Bence.

F Of the testator's three daughters: Maria Ruetta married (before the date of the will) but was without issue. Ellen Amelia Bence married, and had six children, all of whom were living, and three had attained the age of twenty-one years, the defendant Ruetta Louisa Portbury was one of such children. Victoria Louisa married, and died leaving one child, who was the infant defendant.

G On June 12, 1888, the trustees took out an originating summons to determine whether the limitations in the testator's will of the one-fifth share of the testator's real and personal estate given upon trusts for his eldest son and to each of his three daughters respectively for their respective lives and to take effect after the determination of their respective life interests, were valid, and who were entitled to the four-fifths of the real and residuary personal estate.

H On July 11, 1888, KAY, J., ordered that, as to the one-fifth share of William Henry, the gift over on his death without leaving any issue took effect, and that such one-fifth share had become divisible among the other four children of the testator, but as to the share of each of the testator's daughters subject to the limitations in the will contained of her original share; and it was declared, as to the one-fifth share of Victoria Louisa, and her one-fourth share in the one-fifth share of William Henry, that, in the event, which had happened, of her having a child, the limitations over on her death were void for remoteness, and the one-fifth share and one-fourth of one-fifth devolved on William Henry as the testator's heir-at-law. KAY, J., however, stated that he did not decide any question which might arise on the death of a daughter without issue.

I On Oct. 10, 1890, Maria Ruetta died without having had any issue, and on Dec. 5, 1890, the present originating summons was taken out, which was heard by KEKEWICH, J., in March, 1891; against whose decision the defendants, Ruetta

Louisa Portbury and John Frederick, who represented persons entitled under the gift over, if valid, now appealed. A

Cur. adv. vult. B

June 17, 1891. FRY, L.J., read the following judgment: The testator in this case directed his trustees to stand possessed of one-fifth of his real and personal property in trust for his daughter Maria during her life, and after her decease on trust declared by reference for the benefit of a class which consists of the following persons: (i) the children of Maria who should attain twenty-one, or, being daughters, should attain that age or be married; (ii) such of the children of any child of Maria who might die under twenty-one as should attain twenty-one, or, being a daughter, be married. It is evident that Maria might have a son born after the testator's death, and this son might die before twenty-one, leaving a child who might attain twenty-one, and so become an object of the testator's bounty. It follows that this class includes persons who might not be ascertained till after a life in being and twenty-one years afterwards. Such a gift is plainly void under the well-established rule that a gift to a class is void unless the whole class be ascertained within the period allowed by the rule against perpetuities. The testator has then directed that, if Maria should die without leaving any issue who should live to attain a vested interest in their respective shares, then the share given to Maria for life should be in trust for such of his children as should be living at the time of such failure of issue, and the issue then living of such of them as might then be dead. On Oct. 10, 1890, the testator's daughter Maria died without having had any issue; and the question is, whether the gift over can take effect. C

The whole property in question is, we are informed by the Bar, real estate. The first question is this. Is the event on which the gift over is to operate confined to the death of Maria, or does it extend to an indefinite failure of issue? It appears to us that s. 29 of the Wills Act, 1837, does not apply to this gift, because it comes within the proviso to that section which prevents the enactments from extending to cases where the language refers to the event of no issue living to answer the description required for obtaining a vested estate by a preceding gift to such issue. It follows that the old law must apply, and under the well-known case of Forth v. Chapman (1) it appears to be clear that the gift over is to take effect on an indefinite failure of the issue of Maria, an event which might happen either within or beyond the period of a life in being and twenty-one years afterwards. In the present case we have three circumstances: (i) that the particular estate which precedes the remainder in question is limited to a class which may never be ascertained within the limits of perpetuity; (ii) that the event on which the gift over is to take effect—default of the vesting of the particular estate—may in like manner never be ascertained within those limits; and (iii) that the class of persons to take under the gift over may never be ascertained within the same limits. These circumstances are, in our opinion, enough to make the gifts over (whether regarded as equitable remainders or executory devises) prima facie bad. D

The argument of the defendants is that the terms of the gift over can be split up into as many separate gifts over as there are possible events, and that, whenever the actual event falls within the limits of perpetuity, the gift over is good; whenever it falls beyond the limit it is bad. There appears to us to be a great cloud of authorities opposed to this view, among which it will be enough to mention Proctor v. Bishop of Bath and Wells (2); Lord Dungannon v. Smith (3); Burley v. Evelyn (4); Monypenny v. Dering (5); Miles v. Harford (6); and Re Finch, Abbiss v. Burney (7). The only cases which have been cited as counter- E

A vailing these authorities are Evers v. Challis (8), and Watson v. Young (9). In the former of these cases the testator gave an estate to his daughter Ann for life, with remainder to her sons who should attain twenty-three, and her daughters who should attain twenty-one, with cross-remainders between them; and then the testator directed that, in case his daughter Ann should die without issue, or in case all the children which his daughter might have should die, if sons
B under twenty-three, or if daughters under twenty-one, then the estate should go over to persons including the lessor of the plaintiff. The testator gave another estate in like manner to his daughter Elizabeth for life, with similar remainders to her children, and directed that, in case all the children of his daughter Elizabeth should die, if sons under twenty-three, and if daughters under twenty-one, or if she had none, then the estate should go over in shares which vested
C interest in the lessor of the plaintiff. Both Ann and Elizabeth died without ever having had any child, so that the event expressed by the testator in regard to Ann, of her dying without issue, happened; and in like manner the event expressed in regard to Elizabeth of her having no issue, also happened.

The case was principally discussed upon the terms of the gift over upon the death of Elizabeth, who died first; and it seems to have been held in the Queen's
D Bench, and in the Exchequer Chamber, and in the House of Lords, that there was no difference in the operation of the two gifts over; the gifts over were held good by the House of Lords. The view taken appears to have depended on this, that the limitations over on the death of Ann expressed and constituted two gifts: the one, on her dying without issue, which was a remainder; the other on the death of all her children, if sons under twenty-three, if daughters
E under twenty-one, which would have operated not as a remainder, but as an executory devise defeating estates in fee, which the House of Lords held would have vested in any children whom Ann might leave. In like manner, in regard to Elizabeth, the testator expressly provided for two events: namely, (i) the death of Elizabeth without ever having had a child, in which case the gift over was a true remainder; and (ii) the death of all her children, if sons under
F twenty-three, and if daughters under twenty-one, which, if it took effect at all, would take effect only as an executory devise defeating the estates in fee vested in Elizabeth's children on her death. This case, therefore, presented the two circumstances of an expression by the testator of the two contingencies, and of the fact that one of the gifts over in each case could operate as a true remainder, while the other could operate only as an executory devise; the events on which
G the remainders were limited occurred, and the remainders vested, and this vesting, it was held, could not be interfered with by the existence of executory devises limited upon other contingencies.

This case, therefore, in our opinion, proceeds on the application of the well-known principle, that a limitation shall, if and when, and so far as possible, be construed as a remainder rather than as an executory devise, to dispositions
H so expressed as to sever the remainders from the executory devise. The case is, therefore, no authority for the proposition that every gift over may be analysed into as many events as are included within its language, and be held good or bad as the events happen. This is shown, in our opinion, by the language of the learned Lords and of the judges who advised the House, and especially by their adoption and affirmation of Proctor v. Bishop of Bath and Wells (2).
I The gift over in that case was single in point of expression, but in point of fact embraced one event which happened, and on which a perfectly good remainder could have been limited; but inasmuch as it was not expressly so limited, inasmuch as the event of death without having any issue was not separated from a subsequent event which might transgress the rule against perpetuities, it was held that in that case the limitation over could not operate as a remainder. If the opinion of PEARSON, J., in Watson v. Young (8) differs from that above expressed, we are unable to concur with it. For these reasons we dismiss the appeal with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I wish to add that I accept the construction of the will which we have adopted, because it seems to me that we cannot depart from it without disregarding authorities by which we are bound. A

By her will, dated Mar. 13, 1856, the testatrix gave her residuary personal estate, after payment of certain legacies given by the will or which might be given under any codicil, on trusts under which H., a married woman, took a reversionary interest. On Dec. 31, 1857, the Married Women's Reversionary Interests Act, 1857 (Malin's Act), came into operation. On April 28, 1864, the testatrix made a codicil, expressed to be a codicil to her last will and testament, by which she gave additional legacies to other persons. H., by deed dated Mar. 2, 1868, and acknowledged by deed dated Mar. 7, 1868, pursuant to the Act of 1857, purported to assign her reversionary interest to a purchaser. G

Held: the will was not re-published as at the date of the codicil so as to make the will an "instrument made after" the coming into operation of the Act; for the purposes of the Act H. became entitled to the reversionary interest under the will at the date of its execution; and, therefore, the acknowledged deed of assignment executed by H. was not effectual to pass the property. H

I Appeal from a decision of CHITTY, J., by the plaintiff in an action against the trustees of the will of the testatrix and Mrs. Louisa Hamilton, claiming as a purchaser, as assignee of from his father, to be entitled to the one-sixth share of Mrs. Louisa Hamilton in the residuary personal estate on the death of Mrs. Harriet Wright by virtue of a deed made on Mar. 2, 1868, and duly acknowledged on Mar. 7, 1868, executed by Mrs. Louisa Hamilton pursuant to the Married Women's Reversionary Interests Act, 1857 (Malins' Act).

By her will, dated Mar. 13, 1856, the testatrix, Louisa Elcom, after giving certain legacies, gave all the residue of her real and personal estate to her executors and trustees, William Lloyd Birkbeck and Edward Basil Jupp, on trust to sell, call in, and convert it into money, on trust to pay her debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the legacies thereinbefore given, or which she might give by any codicil to her will; and, after directing the payment of certain further legacies, the testatrix directed her trustees to invest the residue of her estate in the manner provided, and to pay the income to Harriet Wright for life; and on her death to hold the trust funds in trust for all or any the children and child of Harriet Wright who, being a son or sons, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters, should attain that age or marry, and be divided among them, if more than one, in equal shares. The testatrix declared that the several pecuniary legacies thereinbefore given to such person or persons as were, or should be married should be for their separate use, and free from the debts, control, or interference of their husbands, and that their receipts, or the receipts of any person or persons to whom they should by writing under their hands direct their legacies to be paid, should, and notwithstanding coverture, be sufficient discharges for such legacies.

The testatrix made a codicil to her will, dated April 28, 1864, expressed to be a codicil to her last will and testament, whereby she gave several pecuniary legacies, some in addition to what they would take under her will.

The testatrix died on April 19, 1866, and her will and codicil were duly proved on June 6, 1866.

Harriet Wright was married to John Wright, and had issue, one of whom was Louisa Wright, who married John Edmund Hamilton. On Dec. 20, 1867, Mrs. Louisa Hamilton and her husband sold by auction her absolute reversion on the death of Mrs. Harriet Wright, to one-sixth of the residuary estate of the testatrix to Thomas Layborn for £350.

By a deed dated Mar. 2, 1868, Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton assigned to Thomas Layborn, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the share and interests, vested or contingent original or accruing, expectant on the decease of Mrs. Harriet Wright, to which Mrs. Hamilton or her husband in her right then or should thereafter be entitled under the will of the testatrix. The deed was acknowledged by Mrs. Hamilton on Mar. 7, 1868, in pursuance of Malin's Act (Married Women's Reversionary Interests Act, 1857).

By a deed dated Mar. 19, 1877, made between Thomas Layborn of the one part, and his son Thomas Richard Layborn of the other part, Thomas Layborn assigned the reversionary interest to Thomas Richard Layborn. On Mar. 19, 1890, Henry Grover Wright and William Joseph Fraser were appointed new trustees of the will of the testatrix.

The action came on for trial before CHITTY, J.

Nov. 22, 1893. CHITTY, J., read the following judgment.—The question is whether the deed executed after Dec. 31, 1857, by Mrs. Hamilton, then a married woman, and duly acknowledged by her in the manner required by Married Women's Reversionary Interests Act, 1857, commonly called Malin's Act, was effectual to pass her reversionary interest in personal estate, the principal point being whether she was entitled to the reversionary interest under an instrument made after Dec. 31, 1857, within the meaning of the Act. She acquired the reversionary interest under the testamentary dispositions of Louisa Elcom. By her will, made before Dec. 31, 1857, the testatrix bequeathed her residuary personal estate, after payment of the legacies thereinbefore bequeathed or which she might bequeath by any codicil, upon trusts under which Mrs. Hamilton took the reversionary interest in question. After Dec. 31, 1857, the testatrix made a codicil, whereby she bequeathed additional pecuniary legacies. The codicil is expressed to be a codicil to her last will and testament. It does not in terms confirm the will, but, as was admitted on both sides in the argument, nothing turns on that circumstance.

- A In support of the deed an argument was founded on the general object of the Act. Before it was passed a married woman could not effectually dispose of her reversionary interest in personalty except where it was limited to her for her separate use or where a special power of disposition was conferred on her. The object of the Act, as appears on the face of it, was to enable her by acknowledged deed to dispose of her reversionary interest in personalty except
- B where she is restrained from alienation, and where the interest is acquired under her marriage settlement. The Act is not retrospective; it is confined to dispositions made by her after Dec. 31, 1857, and the interests to which she shall be entitled under any instruments made after that date. A consideration of the general object of the Act does not throw any material light on the meaning of the particular words used. All that can be justly said is, that the Act enlarges
- C the capacity of a married woman in the manner and to the extent prescribed by the Act, and subject to the provisions and restrictions therein contained.

- In support of the deed it was pointed out that the words in the proviso at the end of s. 1, "shall become entitled by virtue of any deed, will, or instrument," show that "any instrument" in the previous enacting part of the same section include a will. This is clear and would be so without the proviso. Then it
- D was said that the word "will" means the aggregate of a man's testamentary intentions, so far as they are manifested in writing duly executed according to the statutes relating to wills; and in support of this proposition the judgment of LORD PENZANCE in Lemage v. Goodban (1) was cited. Thereupon it was urged that no man could be properly said to have made his will until he had finished his last codicil: and, applying this reasoning to the present case, the conclusion
- E arrived at was that the testatrix's will and codicil, taken together, constituted her will, and that her will was, therefore, made after Dec. 31, 1857. But the question is, whether this reasoning has any application to the Act under consideration. By using the term "instrument" the legislature appears to have directed its attention to the particular instrument under which the married woman is entitled, and not to the set of instruments which together make up the will.
- F Mrs. Hamilton is entitled under the will to the reversionary interest thereby bequeathed, subject only to the diminution contemplated by the will itself of the amount of the residue by legacies left by the codicil; and the will itself, regarded as a separate document, was actually made before the date mentioned in the Act. The Act treats the date at which a testator's testamentary dispositions come into operation by his death as immaterial. Persons still living
- G at the passing of the Act (Aug. 25, 1857) who had already made their wills, and persons who afterwards made their wills before or on Dec. 31, 1857, were in effect told that their wills would be left to operate in regard to married women under the law as it stood at the passing of the Act; that it was not necessary for them to insert any restraint upon alienation in order to prevent the married woman from disposing of her interest.

- H In dealing with the Act I am bound to take the words as I find them, and to construe them in their ordinary and natural sense. I think the words refer to the particular instrument containing the gift, which in this case is the will, and that this instrument was made within the meaning of the Act at the time when it was duly executed and attested as required by law. In his able and learned argument against the deed, counsel for the defendants referred to various
- I expressions which have been used in reference to the effect of a codicil on a will—such as "a codicil is part of the will"; "a codicil republished the will"; "it incorporates or reiterates the will"; or "draws down the date of the will to its own date," and the like; and he contended, and as I think rightly, that all such expressions must be considered in reference to the particular case which was under discussion. They have no direct bearing on this case. Reference was made to s. 34 of the Wills Act, 1837, which enacts that the Act shall not extend to any will made before Jan. 1, 1838, and that every will re-executed or republished or revived by any codicil shall, for the purposes of that Act, be deemed to have been made at the time at which the same shall be so re-executed, republished, or revived. The operation of the section is, therefore, confined to the purposes of that particular Act, and there is no such enactment in Malin's Act. The section, so far as it goes, supports the conclusion at which I have arrived. A

Of the numerous authorities cited at the Bar, I think it necessary to refer only to Rolfe v. Perry (2). The question there was the meaning of the words, "will, deed, or document already made or to be made before Jan. 1, 1855," in Locke King's Act (Real Estate Charges Act, 1854). In that case there were two wills, both duly executed and attested, one before and the other after the date mentioned. LORD WESTBURY held that the words "already made" referred to the actual making of the first will, and declined to apply any doctrine of republication by the second will. The decision, no doubt, was on a different Act, in which the words were somewhat different; but it has a close application to the present case, and it at least shows that the word "will" in an Act of Parliament may be properly construed as referring to a particular instrument. For these reasons I hold that the acknowledged deed was not within the Act, and, therefore, that Mrs. Hamilton is not bound by it. B

From that decision the plaintiff now appealed. C

Byrne, Q.C., and Hull for the plaintiff.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the defendants, was not called on to argue. D

Dec. 13, 1893. LINDLEY, L.J.—I think that it is unnecessary for us to hear counsel for the defendants, for the language of Malins' Act (Married Women's Reversionary Interests Act, 1857) is too strong for the plaintiff, although we have certainly no disposition to assist the defendants, and only do so if we are obliged. The facts are shortly these: In 1856 Louisa Elcom made a will giving her residuary estate to the mother of Mrs. Hamilton for life with remainder to her children who should attain twenty-one or marry. In 1864 the testatrix made a codicil giving certain additional legacies. In 1866 the testatrix died. In 1868 Mrs. Hamilton purported to assign her share of the residuary estate of the testatrix to Thomas Layborn. Malins' Act was passed in Aug. 25, 1857, s. 1 of which provides: E

"After Dec. 31, 1857, it shall be lawful for every married woman by deed to dispose of every future or reversionary interest, whether vested or contingent, of such married woman, or her husband in her right, in any personal estate whatsoever to which she shall be entitled under any instrument made after Dec. 31, 1857 (except such a settlement as after-mentioned). . . ." F

The short point which we have to decide is, whether Mrs. Hamilton became entitled to this reversionary interest "under any instrument made after Dec. 31, 1857." If she did, then the assignment by her by the deed of Mar. 2, 1868, is good, and she is bound by it; if she did not, that assignment is inoperative. It is argued for the plaintiff that the will and codicil together constitute the "instrument," under which she is entitled, for that a "will" means the aggregate of a person's testamentary dispositions. No doubt for some purposes a "will" does mean that. But the question is, what does the Act mean when it speaks of being "entitled under any instrument made after Dec. 31"? When was this will made so as to confer a title for the purposes of the Act? My answer is, that it was made when it was first executed. As to authority, cases do not throw much light upon the matter; but, if we are to have any, the one that seems to be nearest in point is Rolfe v. Perry (2). I think the appeal, therefore, fails. G

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question is, under what instrument did Mrs. Hamilton become entitled to this interest? I think, without doubt; under the will which was made on Mar. 13, 1856. It was said that because the testatrix made a H

A codicil to that will in 1864, Mrs. Hamilton became entitled under the aggregate of the testamentary dispositions. But I ask, did she become entitled under the codicil? If anything, she rather became disentitled under the codicil. I agree that the appeal fails.

B DAVEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that “instrument” in Malins’ Act is to be construed as being equivalent to “will” in the sense of an aggregate of testamentary dispositions. The will here made in 1856 is only one of the testamentary dispositions, and so far as it is not revoked, remains in force, and I do not hesitate to say that Mrs. Hamilton is entitled under it.

Contract—Illegality—Public policy—Restraint of trade—Trade association—Conspiracy—Agreement by traders to underbid competitors—Attempt to exclude from trade—Absence of improper motive or acts.

G A combination to trade and to offer, in respect of prices, discounts, and other trade facilities, such terms as will win so large an amount of custom as to render it unprofitable for rival customers to pursue the same trade is not unlawful. It is not illegal for a trader to aim at driving a competitor out of the trade, provided that the motive be his own gain by appropriation of the trade and not merely a malicious intention to injure the competitor, and that the means he uses are lawful.

H The respondents, shipowners trading between China and Europe, with a view of obtaining a monopoly of part of the trade and keeping up the rate of freights, entered into an agreement under which they mutually undertook to give preferential terms to merchants who would ship cargoes to Europe only on the respondents’ vessels, to underbid competing shipowners, and to cease to employ shipping agents who acted for their competitors. In an action by a competing company which alleged that the agreement was unlawful as being in restraint of trade, that the respondents had conspired to injure the company, and that the company’s business had suffered damage thereby,

I Held: there being no evidence of an intention on the part of the respondents to cause the plaintiffs any injury other than such injury as might occur as the result of legitimate commercial competition, no unlawful obstruction of the plaintiffs’ business, and no molestation or intimidation of the plaintiffs, or procurement of anyone to break any contract with them, the agreement was not unlawful, and there was no actionable conspiracy.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of the Court of Appeal (BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., LORD ESHER, M.R., dissenting), reported 23 Q.B.D. 598, affirming a decision of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., reported 21 Q.B.D. 544, in an action tried by him without a jury. H

The appellants were a shipping company, incorporated for the purpose of acquiring shares in certain ships, Sikh, Pathan, Afghan, and Ghazee, which were employed in the China and Australian trades. The respondents were shipowners trading between China and London, who joined themselves into an association for the purpose of keeping up the rate of freights in the tea trade between China and Europe, and of securing that trade to themselves by allowing a rebate of 5 per cent. on all freights paid by shippers who shipped goods to Europe in their vessels only. They alleged that it was the large profits derived from the tea freights which alone enabled them to keep up a regular line of communication all the year round between England and China, and that without a practical monopoly of the tea trade they must cease to do so. On May 10, 1884, the respondents issued from Shanghai the following circular, which was widely I

A distributed among merchants engaged in the China trade :

B "To those exporters who confine their shipment of tea and general cargo from China to Europe (not including the Mediterranean and Black Sea ports) to the Steam Navigation Co.'s, Messageries Maritimes Co.'s, Ocean Steamship Co.'s, "Glen," "Castle," "Shire," and "Ben" lines, and to the steamships Oopack and Ningchow, we shall be happy to allow a rebate of 5 per cent. on the freight charged. Exporters claiming the returns will be required to sign a declaration that they have not made nor been interested in any shipments of tea or general cargo to Europe (except the above named) by any other than the said lines."

In May, 1885, the respondents issued the following circular :

C "Referring to our circular dated May 10, 1884, we beg leave to remind you that shipments for London by the steamships Pathan, Afghan, and Aberdeen, or by other non-conference steamers, at any of the ports in China or at Hong Kong, will exclude the firm making such shipment from participation in the return during the whole six-monthly period within which they have been made, even although the firm elsewhere may have given exclusive support

D to the conference lines."

E The effect of those circulars was, the appellants alleged, to inflict damage upon them, and they sued the respondents for conspiracy and unlawful combination to bribe, coerce, and induce shippers to forbear from shipping cargoes by the appellants' ships. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., held that the association, being formed by the respondents with the view of keeping the trade in their own hands and not with the intention of ruining the trade of the appellants, or through any personal malice or ill-will towards them, was not unlawful, and, therefore, no action for conspiracy was maintainable. This decision was affirmed by a majority of the Court of Appeal.

F Sir Henry James, Q.C., Gorell Barnes, Q.C., and Sims Williams for the appellants.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Finlay, Q.C., Pollard and Box for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

Dec. 18, 1891. The following opinions were read.

G LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—Notwithstanding the elaborate examination which this case has undergone, both as to fact and law, I believe that the facts may be very summarily stated, and when they are stated the law seems to me not open to doubt. An associated body of traders endeavour to get the whole of a limited trade into their own hands by offering exceptional and very favourable terms to customers who will deal exclusively with them—so favourable that,

H but for the object of keeping the trade to themselves, they would not give such terms. If their trading were confined to one particular period they would be trading at a loss, but they give these terms in the belief that by such competition they will prevent rival traders competing with them, and so receive the whole profits of the trade to themselves. I do not think that I have omitted a single fact upon which the appellants rely to show that this course of dealing is unlawful

I and constitutes an indictable conspiracy. It is not denied, and cannot be even argued, that prima facie a trader in a free country in all matters "not contrary to law may regulate his own mode of carrying it on, according to his own discretion and choice." This is the language of ALDERSON, B., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Hilton v. Eckersley (1) (6 E. & B. pp. 74, 75), and no authority, and indeed no argument, has been directed to qualifying that leading proposition. It is necessary, therefore, for the appellants here to show that what I have described as the course pursued by the associated traders is a "matter contrary to law."

After a most careful study of the evidence in this case, I have been unable to discover anything done by the members of the associated body of traders other than an offer of reduced freights to persons who would deal exclusively with them, and if this is unlawful it seems to me that the greater part of the commercial dealings, where there is rivalry in trade, must be equally unlawful. There are doubtless to be found phrases in the evidence which, taken by themselves, might be supposed to mean that the associated traders were actuated by a desire to inflict malicious injury upon their rivals; but when one analyses what is the real meaning of such phrases it is manifest that all that is intended to be implied by it is that any rival trading which shall be started against the association will be rendered unprofitable by the more favourable terms—that is to say, the reduced freights, discounts, and the like—which will be given to customers who will exclusively trade with the associated body. On a review of the facts it is impossible to suggest any malicious intention to injure rival traders, except in the sense that in proportion as one withdraws trade that other people might get, you, to that extent, injure a person's trade when you appropriate the trade to yourself. If such an injury and the motive of its infliction is examined and tested on principle, and can be truly asserted to be a malicious motive within the meaning of the law that prohibits malicious injury to other people, all competition must be malicious, and consequently unlawful—a sufficient reductio ad absurdum to dispose of that head of suggested unlawfulness.

The learned counsel who argued the case for the appellants were pressed from time to time by some of your Lordships to point out what act of unlawful obstruction, violence, molestation, or interference, was proved against the associated body of traders; and, as I have said, the only wrongful thing on which the learned counsel could place their fingers was the competition which I have already dealt with. Intimidation, violence, molestation, or the procuring of people to break their contracts, are all of them unlawful acts; and I entertain no doubt that a combination to procure people to do such acts is a conspiracy and unlawful. The sending up of ships to Hankow, which in itself, and to the knowledge of the associated traders would be unprofitable, but was done for the purpose of influencing other traders against coming there and so encouraging a ruinous competition, is the one fact which appears to be pointed to as out of the ordinary course of trade. After all, what can be meant by "out of the ordinary course of trade?" I should rather think, as a fact, that it is very common within the ordinary course of trade so to compete for a time as to render trade unprofitable to your rival in order that when you have got rid of him you may appropriate the profits of the entire trade to yourself. I entirely adopt and make my own what was said by BOWEN, L.J., in the court below [see p. 280 post]:

"All commercial men with capital are acquainted with the ordinary expedient of sowing one year a crop of apparently unfruitful prices, in order by driving competition away to reap a fuller harvest of profit in the future; and until the present argument at the Bar it may be doubted whether ship-owners or merchants were ever deemed to be bound by law to conform to some imaginary 'normal' standard of freights or prices, or that law courts had a right to say to them in respect of their competitive tariffs, 'thus far shalt thou go and no further.'"

Excluding all I have excluded upon my view of the facts, it is very difficult indeed to formulate the proposition. What is the wrong done? What legal right is interfered with? What coercion of the mind, or will, or of the person, is effected? All are free to trade upon what terms they will, and nothing has been done, except in rival trading, which can be supposed to interfere with the appellants' interests. I think this question is the first to be determined. What injury, if any, has been done? What legal right has been interfered with? Because, if no legal right has been interfered with, and no legal injury inflicted,

- A it is vain to say that the thing might have been done by an individual, but cannot be done by a combination of persons. I do not deny that there are many things which might be perfectly lawfully done by an individual, which, when done by a number of persons, become unlawful. I am unable to concur with the Lord Chief Justice's criticism (21 Q.B.D. at p. 551), if its meaning was rightly interpreted, which I very much doubt, of the observations made by BRAMWELL, B., in
- B R. v. Druitt, Lawrence and Adamson (2), if that was intended to treat as doubtful the proposition that a combination to insult and annoy a person would be an indictable conspiracy. I should have thought it as beyond doubt or question that such a combination would be an indictable misdemeanour. I cannot think the Lord Chief Justice meant to throw any doubt upon such a proposition. But in this case, the thing done, the trading by a number of persons together, effects no more and is no more, so to speak, a combined operation than that of a single person.
- C If the thing done is rendered unlawful by combination, the course of trade by a person who singly trades for his own benefit and apart from partnership or sharing profits with others, but nevertheless avails himself of combined action, would be open to the same objections. The merchant who buys for him, the agent who procures orders for him, the captain who sails his ship, and even the sailors—if they might be supposed to have knowledge of the transaction—would be acting in combination for the general result, and would, whether for the benefit of the individual, or for an associated body of traders, make it not the less combined action than if the combination were to share profits with independent traders; and if a combination to effect that object would be unlawful, the sharers in the combined action could, in a charge of criminal conspiracy, make no defence that they were captain, agent, or sailors, respectively, if they were knowingly rendering their aid to what, by the hypothesis, would be unlawful if done in combination.

- A totally separate head of unlawfulness has, however, been introduced by the suggestion that the thing is unlawful because in restraint of trade. There are two senses in which the word "unlawful" is not uncommonly though, I think, somewhat inaccurately, used. There are some contracts to which the
- F law will not give effect; and, therefore, although the parties may enter into what, but for the element which the law condemns, would be perfect contracts, the law will not allow them to operate as contracts, notwithstanding that, in point of form, the parties have agreed. Some such contracts may be void on the ground of immorality; some on the ground that they are contrary to public policy, as, for example, in restraint of trade; and contracts so tainted the law will not lend its aid to enforce. It treats them as if they had not been made at all. But the more accurate use of the word unlawful, which would bring the contract within the qualification which I have quoted from the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, namely, as "contrary to law," is not applicable to such contract. [It has never been held that a contract in restraint of trade is contrary to law in the sense that I have indicated. A judge in very early times expressed great indignation at such a contract (HULL, J., Yearbook, 2 Hen. 5, fol. 5, pl. 26); and CROMPTON, J., undoubtedly did say in a case where such an observation was wholly unnecessary to the decision, and, therefore, manifestly obiter, that the parties to a contract in restraint of trade would be indictable: Hilton v. Eckersley (1). I am unable to assent to that dictum. It is opposed to the whole current of authority. It was dissented from by LORD CAMPBELL,
- H C.J., and ERLE, J., and found no support when the case in which it was said came to the Exchequer Chamber, and it seems to me contrary to principle.

I In the result, I think that no case whatever is made out of a conspiracy such as the appellants here undertook to establish; and it is not unimportant, for the reasons I have given, to see what is the conspiracy alleged in the statement of claim. The first count alleges the conspiracy to be "to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining cargoes for steamers owned by the plaintiffs." The word "prevent" is sufficiently wide to comprehend both lawful means and unlawful; but, as I have already said, in proof there is nothing but the competition with which I have dealt. The second paragraph alleges that in pursuance of the conspiracy people were "bribed, coerced, and induced to agree to forbear, and to forbear from shipping cargoes by the steamers of the plaintiffs." If the word "bribed" is satisfied by the offering lower freights and larger discounts, then that is proved, but then the word "bribed" is robbed of any legal significance. "Coerced" is not justified by any evidence in the case, and the word "induced" is absolutely neutral, and no unlawful inducement is proved. The third paragraph uses language such as "intention to injure the plaintiff," "threats of stopping the shipment of homeward cargoes," and the like. But I ask myself whether, if an indictment had set out the facts without using the ambiguous language to which I have referred in the statement of claim, it would have disclosed an indictable offence. I am very clearly of opinion it would not. I am of opinion, therefore, that the whole matter comes round to the original proposition, whether a combination to trade, and to offer, in respect of prices, discounts and other trade facilities, such terms as will win so large an amount of custom as to render it unprofitable for rival customers to pursue the same trade, is unlawful, and I am clearly of opinion that it is not. I think, therefore, that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON.—At the hearing of this appeal in April, 1891, your Lordships had the benefit of listening to a learned and exhaustive discussion of the law applicable to combination or conspiracy. It appeared to me at the time—and further consideration has confirmed my impression—that much of the legal argument addressed to us had a very distant relation to the circumstances of the present case, which are simple enough.

The evidence, oral and documentary, contains an unusual amount of figurative language indicating a wide difference of opinion as to the legal aspect of the facts, but presents no conflict with regard to the facts themselves. The respondents are firms and companies owning steam-vessels, which ply regularly, during the whole year, some of them on the great river of China, between Hankow and Shanghai, and others between Shanghai and European ports. During the tea season—which begins in May and lasts for about six weeks—most shippers prefer to have their tea sent direct from Hankow to Europe; but it suits the respondents' trade better to have the tea which they carry brought down to Shanghai by their ordinary river service, and then trans-shipped for Europe. Accordingly, they do not send their ocean steamers up the river, except when they find it necessary in order to intercept cargoes which might otherwise have been shipped from Hankow in other than their vessels. The appellants are also a shipowning company. They do not maintain a regular service, either on the great river or between Europe and Hankow; but they send vessels to Hankow during the tea season, with the legitimate object of sharing in the profits of the tea-carrying trade, which appear in ordinary circumstances to have been considerable. The respondents entered into an agreement, the avowed purpose of which was to secure for themselves as much of the tea shipped from Hankow as their vessels could conveniently carry, which was practically the whole of it, and to prevent the appellants and other outsiders from obtaining a share of the trade. The consequence of their acting upon the agreement was that the appellants, having sent their ships to Hankow, were unable to obtain cargoes at remunerative rates, and they claim as damages due to them by the respondents the difference between their actual earnings and the freights which their vessels might have earned had it not been for the combined action of the respondents.

As the law is now settled, I apprehend that, in order to substantiate their claim, the appellants must show either that the object of the agreement was unlawful, or that illegal methods were resorted to in its prosecution. If neither the end contemplated by the agreement nor the means used for its attainment were contrary to law, the loss suffered by the appellants was damnum sine injuria. The agreement of which the appellants complain left the contracting parties free

A to recede from it at their pleasure, and is not obnoxious to the rule of public policy which was recognised in Hilton v. Eckersley (1). The decision in that case, which was the result of judicial opinions not altogether reconcilable, appears to me to carry the rule no further than this—that an agreement by traders to combine for a lawful purpose and for a specified time is not binding upon any of the parties to it if he chooses to withdraw, and, consequently, cannot be enforced in invitum. In my opinion, it is not an authority for the proposition that an outsider can plead the illegality of such a contract, while the parties are willing to act and continue to act upon the ground that they have agreed for a specific period. I venture to think that the decision of this appeal depends upon more tangible considerations than any which could be derived from the study of what is generally known as public policy.

C I have never seen any reason to suppose that the parties to the agreement had any other object in view than that of defending their carrying trade during the tea season against the encroachments of the appellants and other competitors, and of attracting to themselves custom which might otherwise have been carried off by these competitors. That is an object which is strenuously pursued by merchants great and small in every branch of commerce, and it is in the eye of the law perfectly legitimate. If the respondents' combination had been formed, not with a single view to the extension of their business and the increase of its profits, but with the main and ulterior design of effecting an unlawful object, a very different question would have arisen for the consideration of your Lordships. But no such case is presented by the facts disclosed in this appeal.

E The object of the combination being legal, was any illegal act committed by the respondents in giving effect to it? The appellants invited your Lordships to answer that question in the affirmative, on the ground that the respondents' competition was unfair, by which they no doubt meant that it was tainted with illegality. The facts which they mainly relied on were these—that the respondents allowed a discount of 5 per cent. upon their freight accounts for the year to all customers who shipped no tea to Europe except by their vessels; that, whenever the appellants sent a ship to load tea at Hankow, the respondents sent one or more of their ocean steamers to underbid her, so that neither vessel could obtain cargo on remunerative terms; and, lastly, that the respondents took away the agency of their vessels from persons who also acted as shipping agents for the appellants and other trade competitors outside the combination. I cannot for a moment suppose that it is the proper function or right of courts of law to fix the lowest prices at which traders can sell or buy for the purpose of protecting or extending their business without committing legal wrong which may subject them in damages. Until that becomes the law of the land it is, in my opinion, idle to assert that the legality of mercantile competition ought to be gauged by the amount of the consideration for which a competing trader thinks fit to part with his goods or to accept employment. The withdrawal of agency first

F appeared to me to be a matter attended with difficulty, but, on consideration, I am satisfied that it cannot be regarded as an illegal act. In the first place, it was impossible that any honest man could impartially discharge his duty of finding freights to parties who occupied the hostile position of the appellants and respondents; and, in the second place, the respondents gave the agents the option of continuing to act for one or other of them, and in circumstances which placed the appellants at no disadvantage.

I In this case it has not been proved, and it has not been suggested, that the respondents used either misrepresentation or compulsion for the purpose of attaining the object of their combination. The only means by which they endeavoured to obtain shipments for their vessels to the exclusion of others was the inducement of cheaper rates of freight than the appellants were willing to accept. I entertain no doubt that the judgments appealed from ought to be affirmed. I am quite satisfied with the reasons assigned for it by BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ. [see p. 278 post], and the observations which I have made were not meant to add to those reasons, but to make it clear that in my opinion the appellants have presented for decision no question of fact or law entitling them to a judgment in their favour. A

LORD BRAMWELL.—The plaintiffs in this case do not complain of any trespass, violence, force, fraud, or breach of contract; nor of any direct tort or violation of any right of the plaintiffs like the case of firing to frighten birds from a decoy: Keeble v. Hickeringill (3); nor of any act, the ultimate object of which was to injure the plaintiffs, having its origin in malice or ill-will to them. The plaintiffs admit that, materially and morally, they have been at liberty to do their best for themselves without any hindrance by the defendants. But they say that the defendants have entered into an agreement in restraint of trade—an agreement, therefore, unlawful; an agreement, therefore, indictable, punishable; and that the defendants have acted in conformity with that unlawful agreement, and thereby caused damage to the plaintiffs in respect of which they are entitled to bring, and bring this action. The plaintiffs have proposed an agreement among the defendants, the object of which was to prevent shipowners, other than themselves, from trading to Shanghai and Hankow. The way in which that was to be accomplished was by giving benefits to those who shipped exclusively by them, by sending vessels to compete with the plaintiffs, and by lowering their, the defendants', rates of freight so that the plaintiffs had to lower theirs to their great loss. There are other matters alleged, but they are accessory to the above, which is the substance of the complaint. B C D

The plaintiffs also say that these things, or some of them, if done by an individual would be actionable. This need not be determined directly, because all the things complained of have their origin in what the plaintiffs say is unlawfulness, a conspiracy to injure; so that if actionable when done by one, much more are they when done by several, and if not actionable when done by several, certainly they are not when done by one. It has been objected by capable persons that it is strange that that should be unlawful if done by several which is not if done by one, and that the thing is wrong if done by one if wrong when done by several; if not wrong when done by one, it cannot be when done by several. I think there is an obvious answer, indeed two: one is that a man may encounter the acts of a single person, yet not be fairly matched against several. The other is that the act when done by an individual is wrong though not punishable, because the law avoids the multiplicity of crimes—de minimis non curat lex—while if done by several it is sufficiently important to be treated as a crime. Let it be, then, that it is no answer to the plaintiffs' complaint that, if what they complain of had been done by an individual, there would be no cause of action. E F G

There is the further question whether there is a cause of action, the acts being done by several. The first position of the plaintiffs is that the agreement among the defendants is illegal as being in restraint of trade, and, therefore, against public policy, and so illegal. "Public policy," said BURROUGH, J., I believe, quoting HOBART, C.J., "is an unruly horse, and dangerous to ride." Richardson v. Mellish (4), 2 Bing. at p. 252. I quote also another distinguished judge, more modern, CAVE, J.: "Certain kinds of contracts have been held void at common law on [the ground of public policy]; a branch of the law, however, which certainly should not be extended, as judges are more to be trusted as interpreters of the law than as expounders of what is called public policy." Re Mirams (5), post p. 371. I think the present case is an illustration of the wisdom of these remarks. I venture to make another. No evidence is given in these public policy cases. The tribunal is to say, as a matter of law, that the thing is against public policy and void. How can the judge do that without any evidence as to its effect and consequences? If the shipping in this case was sufficient for the trade a further supply would have been a waste. There are some people who think that the public is not concerned with this— H I

A people who would make a second railway by the side of one existing, saying "only the two companies will suffer," as though the wealth of the community was not made up of the wealth of the individuals who compose it. I am by no means sure that the conference did not prevent a waste, and was not good for the public. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., thought it was: see his judgment (21 Q.B.D. 544). As to the suggestion that the Chinese profited by the lowering of freights, I cannot say it was not so. There may have been a monopoly or other cause to give them a benefit, but, as a rule, it is clear that the expense of transit, and all other expenses borne by an exported article that has a market price, are borne by the importer, and, therefore, ultimately by the consumer, so that low freights benefit him.

C To go on with the case, take it that the defendants had bound themselves to each other; I think they had, though they might withdraw. Let it be that each member had tied his hands; let it be that that was in restraint of trade; I think upon the authority of Hilton v. Eckersley (1), and other cases, we should hold that the agreement was illegal—that is, not enforceable by law. I will assume, then, that it was, though I am not quite sure. But that is not enough for the plaintiffs. To maintain their action on this ground they must make
D out that it was an offence, a crime, a misdemeanour. I am clearly of opinion it was not. Save the opinion of CROMPTON, J., which is entitled to the greatest respect, but was not assented to by LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., or the Exchequer Chamber, there is no authority for it in the English law. It is quite certain that an agreement may be void, yet the parties to it not punishable. Take the case I put during the argument: a man and woman agree to live together as man
E and wife without marrying. The agreement is illegal, and could not be enforced, but clearly the parties to it would not be indictable. It ought to be enough to say that there is no case where there has been a conviction for such an offence as is alleged against the defendants. It is to be remembered that it is for the plaintiffs to make out the case that the defendants have committed an indictable offence, not for the defendants to disprove it. There needs no argument to F prove the negative.

It is admitted that there may be fair competition in trade, that two may offer to join and compete against a third. If so, what is the definition of fair competition? What is unfair that is neither forcible nor fraudulent? It does seem strange that, to enforce freedom of trade, of action, the law should punish those who make a perfectly honest agreement with a belief that it is fairly
G required for their protection. There is one thing that is to me decisive. I have always said that a combination of workmen, an agreement among them to cease work except for higher wages, and a strike in consequence, was lawful at common law. Perhaps not enforceable inter se, but not indictable; the legislature has now so declared [see Trade Union Act, 1871, s. 1]. The enactment is express, that agreements among workmen shall be binding, whether they would or would
H not but for the Acts have been deemed unlawful as in restraint of trade. Is it supposable that it would have done so in the way it has had the workman's combination been a punishable misdemeanour? Impossible. This seems to me conclusive, that though agreements which fetter the freedom of action in the parties to it may not be enforceable they are not indictable: see also the judgment of FRY, L.J., on this point [see p. 282 post].

I Where is such a contention to stop? Suppose the case put in the argument: In a small town there are two shops sufficient for the wants of the neighbourhood, making only a reasonable profit. They are threatened with a third. The two shopkeepers agree to warn the intending shopkeeper that if he comes they will lower prices, and can afford it longer than he. Have they committed an indictable offence? Remember the conspiracy is the offence, and they have conspired. If he, being warned, does not set up his shop, has he a cause of action? He might prove damages. He might show that from his skill he would have beaten one or both of the others: see in this case the judgment of LORD ESHER, M.R., that the plaintiffs might recover for "damages at large for future years." Would a shipowner who had intended to send his ship to Shanghai, but desisted owing to the defendants' agreement and on being told by them they would deal with him as they had with the plaintiffs, be entitled to maintain an action against the defendants? Why not? If yes, why not every shipowner who could say he had a ship fit for the trade, but was deterred from using it. The Master of the Rolls cites SIR WILLIAM ERLE (the LAW RELATING TO TRADE UNIONS) that

"a combination to violate a private right in which the public has a sufficient interest, is a crime, such violation being an actionable wrong."

True. SIR WILLIAM ERLE means that, where the violation of a private right is an actionable wrong, a combination to violate it, if the public has a sufficient interest, is a crime. But in this case I hold that there is no private right violated.

His Lordship further says:

"If one goes beyond the exercise of the course of trade, and does an act beyond what is the course of trade, in order, that is to say, with intent to molest the other's free course of trade, he is not exercising his own freedom of a course of trade, he is not acting in but beyond the course of trade, and then it follows that his act is an unlawful obstruction of the other's right to a free course of trade, and if such obstruction causes damage to the other he is entitled to maintain an action for the wrong."

I may be permitted to say that this is not very plain. I think it means that it is not in the course of trade for one trader to do acts the motive of which is to damage the trade of another. Whether I should agree depends on the meaning to be put on "course of trade" and "molest." But it is clear that the Master of the Rolls means conduct which would give a cause of action against an individual. He cites SIR WILLIAM ERLE in support of his proposition, who clearly is speaking of acts which would be actionable in an individual, and there is no such act here.

The Master of the Rolls says the lowering of the freight far beyond a lowering for any purpose of trade was not an act done by the respondents in the exercise of their own free right of trade, but for the purpose of interfering with the appellants' right to a free course of trade; therefore, a wrongful act as against the appellants' right, and as injury to the appellants followed they had a right of action. I cannot agree. If there are two shopkeepers in a village and one sold an article at cost price, not for profit therefrom, but to attract customers, or cause his rival to leave off selling the article only, it could not be said he was liable to an action. I cannot think that the respondents did more than they had a legal right to do. I adopt the vigorous language and opinion of FRY, L.J.: "To draw a line between fair and unfair competition, between what is reasonable and unreasonable, passes the power of the courts." It is a strong thing for the appellants to complain of the very practices they wished to share in, and once did. I am of opinion the judgment should be affirmed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN concurred.

LORD MORRIS.—The facts of this case demonstrate that the defendants had no other, or further, object than to appropriate the trade of the plaintiffs. The means used were: first, a rebate to those who dealt exclusively with them; secondly, the sending of ships to compete with the plaintiffs' ships; thirdly, the lowering of the freights; fourthly, the indemnifying other vessels that would compete with the plaintiffs'; fifthly, the dismissal of agents who were acting for them and the plaintiffs. The object was a lawful one. It is not illegal for a trader to aim at driving a competitor out of trade, provided the motive be his own gain by appropriation of the trade, and the means he uses be lawful weapons.

Of the first four of the means used by the defendants, the rebate to customers and the lowering of the freights are the same in principle, being a bonus by

A the defendants to customers to come and deal exclusively with them. The sending of ships to compete and the indemnifying other ships was "the competition" entered on by the defendants with the plaintiffs. The fifth means used, viz., the dismissal of agents, might be questionable according to the circumstances; but in the present case the agents filled an irreconcilable position in being agents for the two rivals, the plaintiffs and the defendants—dismissal under such circumstances became, perhaps, a necessary incident of the warfare in trade. All the acts done, and the means used by the defendants, were acts of competition for the trade. There was nothing in the defendants' acts to disturb any existing contract of the plaintiffs, or to induce anyone to break such. Their action was aimed at making it unlikely that anyone would enter into contracts with the plaintiffs, the defendants offering such competitive inducements as would probably

C prevent them. The use of rhetorical phrases in the correspondence cannot affect the real substance and meaning of it. Again, what one trader may do in respect of competition a body or set of traders can lawfully do; otherwise a large capitalist could do what a number of small capitalists combining together could not do, and thus a blow would be struck at the very principle of co-operation and joint-stock enterprise. I entertain no doubt that a body of traders, whose motive and

D object is to promote their own trade, can combine to acquire, and thereby in so far to injure, the trade of competitors, provided they do no more than is incident to such motive object, and use no unlawful means. The defendants' case clearly comes within the principle I have stated.

As to the contention that the combination was in restraint of trade, and, therefore, illegal. In the first place, was it in restraint of trade? It was a voluntary combination. It was not to continue for any fixed period, nor was there any penalty attached to a breach of the engagement. The operation of attempting to exclude others from the trade might be, and was in fact, beneficial to freighters. Whenever a monopoly was likely to arise, with a consequent rise of rates, competition would naturally arise. I cannot see why judges should be considered specially gifted with prescience of what may hamper or what may increase trade, or of what is to be the test of adequate remuneration. In these days of instant communication with almost all parts of the world competition is the life of trade, and I am not aware of any stage of competition called "fair," intermediate between lawful and unlawful. The question of "fairness" would be relegated to the idiosyncracies of individual judges. I can see no limit to competition, except that you shall not invade the rights of another. But suppose the combination

G in this case was such as might be held to be in restraint of trade, what follows? It could not be enforced. None of the parties to it could sue each other. It might be held void because its tendency might be held to be against the public interests. Does that make, per se, the combination illegal? What a fallacy would it be that what is void and not enforceable becomes a crime; and cases abound of agreements which the law would not enforce, but which are not illegal, which

H you may enter into if you like, but which you will not get any assistance to enforce. I have merely summarised my views, because I adopt so entirely the principles laid down by BOWEN, L.J., in his judgment, with such felicitous illustrations [see p. 278 post], and I concur in the opinion already announced by your Lordships, that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

I LORD FIELD.—I think that this appeal may be decided upon the principles laid down by HOLT, C.J., as far back as Keeble v. Hickeringill (3), cited for the appellant. In that case the plaintiff complained of the disturbance of his "decoy" by the defendant having discharged guns near to it, and so driven away the wildfowl, with the intention and effect of the consequent injury to his trade. Upon the trial a verdict passed for the plaintiff, but in arrest of judgment it was alleged that the declaration did not disclose any cause of action. HOLT, C.J., however, held that the action, although new in instance, was not new in reason or principle, and well lay, for he said that the use of a "decoy" was a lawful trade, and that he who hinders another in his trade or livelihood is liable to an action if the injury is caused by "a violent or malicious act." He said: A

"Suppose, for instance, the defendant had shot in his own grounds, if he had occasion to shoot it would have been one thing, but to shoot on purpose to damage the plaintiff is another thing and a wrong."

But, he added, if the defendant, "using the same employment as the plaintiff," B had set up another decoy so near as to spoil the plaintiff's custom, no action would lie, because the defendant had "as much liberty to make and use a decoy" as the plaintiff.

In support of this view he referred to earlier authorities. In one of them it had been held that for the setting up of a new school to the damage of an ancient one by alluring the scholars no action would lie, although it would have been otherwise if the scholars had been driven away by violence or threats. It follows, C therefore, from this authority, and is undoubted law, not only that it is not every act causing damage to another in his trade, nor even every intentional act causing such damage, which is actionable, but also that acts done by a trader in the lawful way of his business, although by the necessary results of effective competition interfering injuriously with the trade of another, are not the subject D of any action. Of course, it is otherwise, as pointed out by LORD HOLT, if the acts complained of, although done in the way and under the guise of competition or other lawful right, are in themselves violent or purely malicious, or have for their ultimate object injury to another from ill-will to him, and not the pursuit of lawful rights. No doubt, also, there have been cases in which agreements to do acts injurious to others have been held to be indictable as amounting to conspiracy, the ultimate object or the means being unlawful, although, if E done by an individual, no such consequence would follow. But I think that in all such cases it will be found that there existed either an ultimate object of malice or wrong, or wrongful means of execution involving elements of injury to the public, or, at least, negating the pursuit of a lawful object.

Everything that was done by the respondents was done in the exercise of F their right to carry on their own trade, and was bona fide so done. There was not only no malice or indirect object in fact, but the existence of the right to exercise a lawful employment, in the pursuance of which the respondents acted, negatives the presumption of malice which arises when the purposed infliction of loss and injury upon another cannot be attributed to any legitimate cause, and is, therefore, presumably due to nothing but its obvious object of harm. G All the acts complained of were in themselves lawful, and if they caused loss to the appellants, that was one of the necessary results of competition.

It remains to consider the further contention of the appellants that these acts of the respondents, even if lawful in themselves if done by an individual, are illegal and give rise to an action as having been done in the execution of the conference agreement, which is said to amount to a conspiracy, as being H in restraint of trade and so against public policy and illegal; but this contention, I think, also fails. I cannot say upon the evidence that the agreement in question was calculated to have or had any such result, nor, even if it had, has any authority (except one, no doubt entitled to great weight, but one which has not been generally approved) been cited to show that such an agreement, even if void, is illegal; nor any that, even if it be so, any action lies by an I individual. For these reasons I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LORD HANNEN.—The charge against the defendants is that they conspired together to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining cargoes for their ships by bribing, coercing, and inducing shippers to forbear from shipping cargoes by the plaintiffs' steamers; and it is further complained that the defendants, with intent to injure the plaintiffs, agreed to refuse, and refused to accept cargoes, except upon the terms that the shippers should not ship any cargoes by the

A plaintiffs' steamers. The means by which those alleged objects were sought to be attained were (i) offering to shippers and their agents a rebate of 5 per cent. on the agreed freight, to be made to those who, during a fixed period, shipped only by the defendants' steamers; (ii) sending steamers to Hankow to compete with the steamers of persons not members of the defendants' conference or combination, so as to drive them from the trade of that place; (iii) removing
B from the agency of the defendants' steamers those persons who acted in the interest of non-conference steamers. It was contended that the agreement between the defendants to act in combination, which was proved to exist, was illegal as being in restraint of trade. I think that it was so, in the sense that it was void, and could not have been enforced against any of the defendants who might have violated it: Hilton v. Eckersley (1). But it does not follow that the
C entering into such an agreement would, as contended, subject the persons doing so to an indictment for conspiracy; and I think that the opinion to that effect expressed by CROMPTON, J., in Hilton v. Eckersley (1) is erroneous.

The question, however, raised for our consideration in this case, is whether a person, who has suffered loss in his business by the joint action of those who have entered into such an agreement, can recover damages from them for the
D injury so sustained. In considering this question it is necessary to determine upon the evidence what was the object of the agreement between the defendants, and what were the means by which they sought to attain that object. It appears to me that their object was to secure to themselves the benefit of the carrying trade from certain ports. It cannot, I think, be reasonably suggested that this is unlawful in any sense of the word. The object of every trader is to procure
E for himself as large a share of the trade he is engaged in as he can. If, then, the object of the defendants was legitimate, were the means adopted by them open to objection? I cannot see that they were. They sought to induce shippers to employ them rather than the plaintiffs by offering to such shippers as should during a fixed period deal exclusively with them the advantage of a rebate upon the freights they had paid. This is, in effect, nothing more than the ordinary
F form of competition between traders by offering goods or services at a cheaper rate than their rivals. With regard to the sending of ships to Hankow to compete with the plaintiffs' ships, that appears to have been done in order that the defendants' customers might have the opportunity of sending their goods without forfeiting their right to a rebate. No obstruction was offered, by these ships to the ships of non-conference owners, and by their presence at
G Hankow shippers were left simply to determine whether it was to their pecuniary interest to ship by the defendants' vessels or by others. The removing from the agency of the defendants' vessels those persons who acted in the interest of non-conference steamers appears to me a legitimate mode of securing agents whose exertions would be exclusively devoted to the furtherance of the defendants' trade.

H I arrive at the conclusion, therefore, that the objects sought and the means used by the defendants did not exceed the limits of allowable trade competition, and I know of no restriction imposed by law on competition by one trader with another with the sole object of benefiting himself. I consider that a different case would have arisen if the evidence had shown that the object of the defendants was a malicious one, namely, to injure the plaintiffs, whether they (the defendants)
I should be benefited or not. This is a question on which it is unnecessary to express an opinion, as it appears to be clear that the defendants had no malicious or sinister intent as against the plaintiffs, and that the sole motive of their conduct was to secure certain advantages for themselves.

It only remains for me to refer to the argument that an act which might be lawful for one to do becomes criminal or the subject of civil action by anyone injured by it, if done by several combining together. On this point I think the law is accurately stated by SIR WILLIAM ERLE in his treatise on the law relating to TRADE UNIONS. The principle he lays down is equally applicable to combinations other than those of trade unions. He says (p. 23):

A

"As to combination, each person has a right to choose whether he will labour or not, and also to choose the terms on which he will consent to labour, if labour be his choice. The power of choice in respect of labour and terms which one person may exercise and declare singly many after consultation may exercise jointly, and they may make a simultaneous declaration of their choice, and may lawfully act thereon for the immediate purpose of obtaining the required terms, but they cannot create any mutual obligation having the legal effect of binding each other not to work or not to employ unless upon terms allowed by the combination."

B

In considering the question, however, of what was the motive of the combination, whether it was for the purpose of injuring others, or merely in order to benefit those combining, the fact of several agreeing to a common course of action may be important. There are some forms of injury which can only be effected by the combination of many persons. Thus, if several persons agree not to deal at all with a particular individual, as this could not, under ordinary circumstances, benefit the persons so agreeing, it might well lead to the conclusion that their real object was to injure the individual. But it appears to me that in the present case there is nothing indicating an intention to injure the plaintiffs, except in so far as such injury would be the result of the defendants obtaining for themselves the benefits of the carrying trade by giving better terms to customers than their rivals, the plaintiffs, were willing to offer. For these reasons I think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

[Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

When the case was before the Court of Appeal BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., on July 13, 1889, read the following judgments.

F

BOWEN, L.J.—We are presented in this case with an apparent conflict or antimony between two rights that are equally regarded by the law—the right of the plaintiffs to be protected in the legitimate exercise of their trade, and the right of the defendants to carry on their business as seems best to them, provided they commit no wrong to others. The plaintiffs complain that the defendants have crossed the line which the common law permits, and, inasmuch as for the purposes of the present case we are to assume some possible damage to the plaintiffs, the real question to be decided is whether on such an assumption the defendants in the conduct of their commercial affairs have done anything that is unjustifiable in law.

G

The defendants are a number of shipowners who formed themselves into a league or conference for the purpose of ultimately keeping in their own hands the control of the tea carriage from certain Chinese ports, and for the purpose of driving the plaintiffs and other competitors from the field. In order to succeed in this object and to discourage the plaintiffs' vessels from resorting to those ports the defendants during the "tea harvest" of 1885 combined to offer to the local shippers very low freights, with a view of generally reducing or "smashing" rates, and thus rendering it unprofitable for the plaintiffs to send their ships thither. They offered, moreover, a rebate of 5 per cent. to all local shippers and agents who would deal exclusively with vessels belonging to the conference, and any agent who broke the condition was to forfeit the entire rebate on all shipments made on behalf of any and every one of his principals during the whole year—a forfeiture of rebate or allowance which was denominated as "penal" by the plaintiffs' counsel. It must, however, be taken as established that the rebate was one which the defendants need never have allowed at all to their customers. It must also be taken that the defendants had no personal ill-will to the plaintiffs, nor any desire to harm them except such as is involved in the wish and intention to discourage by such measures the plaintiffs from sending rival vessels to such ports.

I

The acts of which the plaintiffs particularly complained were as follows: (i) A circular of May 10, 1885, by which the defendants offered to the local shippers and their agents a benefit by way of rebate if they would not deal with the plaintiffs, which was to be lost if this condition was not fulfilled; (ii) the sending of special ships to Hankow in order by competition

A to deprive the plaintiffs' vessels of profitable freight; (iii) the offer at Hankow of freights at a level which would not repay a shipowner for his adventure, in order to "smash" freights and frighten the plaintiffs from the field; (iv) pressure put on the defendants' own agents to induce them to ship only by the defendants' vessels and not by those of the plaintiffs. It is to be observed with regard to all these acts of which complaint is made that they were acts that in themselves could not be said to be illegal, unless made so by the object with which or the combination in the course of which they were done; and that in reality what is complained of

B is the pursuing of trade competition to a length which the plaintiffs consider oppressive and prejudicial to themselves.

We were invited by the plaintiffs' counsel to accept the position from which their argument started—that an action will lie if a man maliciously and wrongfully conducts himself so as to injure another in that other's trade. Obscurity resides in the language used to state this proposition. The terms "maliciously," "wrongfully," and "injure" are words all of which

C have accurate meanings well known to the law, but which also have a popular and less precise signification into which it is necessary to see that the argument does not imperceptibly slide. An intent to "injure" in strictness means more than an intent to harm. It connotes an intent to do wrongful harm. "Maliciously," in like manner, means and implies an intention to do an act which is wrongful, to the detriment of another. The term "wrongful" imports in its turn the infringement of some right. The ambiguous proposition to which we were invited by the plaintiffs' counsel still, therefore, leaves unsolved the question what, as between the

D plaintiffs and the defendants, are the rights of trade. For the purpose of clearness I desire as far as possible to avoid terms in their popular use so slippery, and to translate them into less fallacious language wherever I shall employ them. The English law, which in its earlier stages began with but an imperfect line of demarcation between torts and breaches of contract, presents us with no scientific analysis of the degree to which the intent to harm, or, in the language of the civil law, the animus vicini nocendi may enter into or affect the conception of a personal wrong: see Chasemore v. Richards (6), 7 H. of L. Cas. at p. 388. All personal

E wrong means the infringement of some personal right. It is essential to an action of tort, say the Privy Council, in Rogers v. Rajendro Dutt (7),

"that the acts complained of should be, under the circumstances, legally wrongful—i.e., they must prejudicially affect another in some legal right. Merely that it will, however directly, do a man harm in his interests, is not enough."

F What, then, were the rights of the plaintiffs as traders as against the defendants? The plaintiffs had a right to be protected against certain kind of conduct, and we have to consider what conduct would pass this legal line or boundary. Intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does in fact damage, another in that other person's property or trade is actionable if done without just cause or excuse. Such intentional action, when done without just cause or excuse, is what the law calls a malicious wrong: see Bromage v. Prosser (8); Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty (9), 7 App.

G Cas. at p. 772, per LORD BLACKBURN. The acts of the defendants which are complained of here were intentional, and were also calculated, no doubt, to do the plaintiffs damage in their trade. But, in order to see whether they were wrongful, we have still to discuss the question whether they were done without any just cause or excuse. Such just cause or excuse the defendants on their side assert to be found in their own positive right (subject to certain limitations) to carry on their own trade freely, in the mode and manner that best suits them, and which they think best calculated to secure their own advantage.

H What, then, are the limitations which the law imposes on a trader in the conduct of his business as between himself and other traders? There seems to be no burdens or restrictions in law upon a trader which arise merely from the fact that he is a trader, and which are not equally laid on all other subjects of the Crown. His right to trade freely is a right which the law recognises and encourages, but it is one which places him at no special disadvantage as compared with others. No man, whether trader or not, can, however, justify damaging

I another in his commercial business by fraud or misrepresentation. Intimidation, obstruction, and molestation are forbidden; so is the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it. The intentional driving away of customers by show of violence (Tarleton v. M'Gawley (10)); the obstruction of actors on the stage by preconcerted hissing (Clifford v. Brandon (11); Gregory v. Brunswick (12)); the disturbance of wildfowl in decoys by the firing of guns (Carrington v. Taylor (13) and Keeble v. Hickeringill (3)); the impeding or threatening servants or workmen (Garret v. Taylor (14)); the inducing persons under personal contracts to break their contracts (Bowen v. Hall (15); Lumley v. Gye (16)); all are instances of such forbidden acts.

But the defendants have been guilty of none of those acts. They have done nothing more against the plaintiffs than pursue to the bitter end a war of competition waged in the interests of their own trade. To the argument that a competition so pursued ceases to have a "just cause or excuse," when there is ill-will or a personal intention to harm, it is sufficient to reply (as I have already pointed out) that there was here no personal intention to do any other or greater harm to the plaintiffs than such as was necessarily involved in the desire to attract to the defendants' ships the entire tea freights of the ports, a portion of which would otherwise have fallen to the plaintiffs' share. I can find no authority for the doctrine that such a commercial motive deprives of "just cause or excuse" acts done in the course of trade which would, but for such a motive, be justifiable. So to hold would be to convert into an illegal motive the instinct of self-advancement and self-protection, which is the very incentive to all trade. To say that a man is to trade freely, but that he is to stop short at any act which is calculated to harm other tradesmen, and which is designed to attract their business to his own shop, would be a strange and impossible counsel of perfection.

But we were told that competition ceases to be the lawful exercise of trade, and so to be a lawful excuse for what will harm another, if carried to a length which is not "fair or reasonable." The offering of reduced rates by the defendants in the present case is said to have been "unfair." This seems to assume that, apart from fraud, intimidation, molestation, or obstruction of some other personal right in rem or in personam, there is some natural standard of "fairness" or "reasonableness" to be determined by the internal consciousness of judges and juries beyond which competition ought not in law to go. There seems to be no authority, and I think, with submission, that there is no sufficient reason for such a proposition. It would impose a novel fetter upon trade. The defendants, we are told by the plaintiffs' counsel, might lawfully lower rates, provided they did not lower them beyond a "fair freight" — whatever that may mean. But where is it established that there is any such restriction upon commerce, and what is to be the definition of a "fair freight?" It is said that it ought to be a "normal" rate of freight, such as is reasonably remunerative to the shipowner. But over what period of time is the average of this reasonable remunerativeness to be calculated? All commercial men with capital are acquainted with the ordinary expedient of sowing one year a crop of apparently unfruitful prices in order by driving competition away to reap a fuller harvest of profit in the future, and until the present argument at the Bar it may be doubted whether shipowners or merchants were ever deemed to be bound by law to conform to some imaginary "normal" standard of freights or prices, or that law courts had a right to say to them in respect of their competitive tariffs: "Thus far shall they go and no further."

To attempt to limit English competition in this way would probably be as hopeless an endeavour as the experiment of King Canute. But on ordinary principles of law no such fetter on freedom of trade can, in my opinion, be warranted. A man is bound not to use his property so as to infringe upon another's rights: sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. If engaged in actions which may involve danger to others, he ought, speaking generally, to take reasonable care to avoid endangering them. But there is surely no doctrine of law which compels him to use his property in a way that judges and juries may consider "reasonable": see Chasemore v. Richards (6). If there is no such fetter upon the use of property known to the English law, why should there be any such fetter upon trade?

It is urged, however, on the part of the plaintiffs, that even if the acts complained of would not be wrongful had they been committed by a single individual, they become actionable when they are the result of concerted action among several. In other words, the plaintiffs, it is contended, have been injured by an illegal conspiracy. Of the general proposition that certain kinds of conduct not criminal in any one individual may become criminal if done by combination among several there can be no doubt. The distinction is based on sound reason, for a combination may make oppressive or dangerous that which, if it proceeded only from a single person, would be otherwise, and the very fact of the combination may show that the object is simply to do harm, and not to exercise one's own just rights. In the application of this undoubted principle it is necessary to be very careful not to press the doctrine of illegal conspiracy beyond that which is necessary for the protection of individuals or of the public; and it may be observed in passing that as a rule it is the damage wrongfully done, and not the conspiracy, that is the gist of actions on the case for conspiracy: see Skinner v. Guntton (17); Hutchins v. Hutchins (18); BIGELOW'S LEADING CASES ON TORTS, 207.

But what is the definition of an illegal combination? It is an agreement by one or more to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means: O'Connell v. R. (19); R. v. Parnell (20). And the question to be solved is whether there has been any such agreement here. Have the defendants combined to do an unlawful act? Have they combined to do a lawful act by unlawful means? A moment's consideration will be sufficient to show that this new inquiry only drives us back to the circle of definitions and legal propositions which I have already traversed in the previous part of this judgment. The unlawful act agreed to,

A if any, between the defendants, must have been the intentional doing of some act to the detriment of the plaintiffs' business without just cause or excuse. Whether there was any such justification or excuse for the defendants is the old question over again, which, so far as regards an individual trader, has been already solved. The only differentia that can exist must arise, if at all, out of the fact that the acts done are the joint acts of several capitalists, and not of one capitalist only.

B The next point is whether the means adopted were unlawful. The means adopted were competition carried to a bitter end. Whether such means were unlawful is in like manner nothing but the old discussion which I have gone through, and which is now revived under a second head of inquiry, except so far as a combination of capitalists differentiates the case of acts jointly done by them from similar acts done by a single man of capital. But I find it impossible myself to acquiesce in the view that the English law places any such restriction on the combination of capital as would be involved in the recognition of such a distinction. If so, one rich capitalist may innocently carry competition to a length which would become unlawful in the case of a syndicate with a joint capital no larger than his own; and one individual merchant may lawfully do that which a firm or a partnership may not. What limits on such a theory would be imposed by law on the competitive action of a joint-stock company (limited) is a problem which might well puzzle a casuist.

The truth is that the combination of capital for purposes of trade and competition is a very different thing from such a combination of several persons against one with a view to harm him as falls under the head of an indictable conspiracy. There is no just cause or excuse in the latter class of cases. There is such a just cause or excuse in the former. There are cases in which the very fact of a combination is evidence of a design to do that which is hurtful without just cause—is evidence, to use a technical expression, of malice. But it is perfectly legitimate, as it seems to me, to combine capital for all the mere purposes of trade, for which capital may, apart from combination, be legitimately used in trade. To limit combinations of capital when used for purposes of competition in the manner proposed by the argument of the plaintiffs would in the present day be impossible—would be only another method of attempting to set boundaries to the tides. Legal puzzles which might well distract a theorist may easily be conceived of imaginary conflicts between the selfishness of a group of individuals and the obvious well-being of other members of the community. Would it be an indictable conspiracy to agree to drink up all the water from a common spring in a time of drought, to buy up by preconcerted action all the provisions in a market or a district in times of scarcity: see R. v. Waddington (21); to combine to purchase all the shares of a company against a coming settling day; or to agree to give away articles of trade gratis in order to withdraw custom from a trader? May two itinerant match vendors combine to sell matches below their value in order, by competition, to drive a third match vendor from the street?

In cases like these where the element of intimidation, molestation, or the other kinds of illegality to which I have alluded are not present, the question must be decided by the application of the test I have indicated. Assume that what is done is intentional and that it is calculated to do harm to others. Then comes the question: Was it done with or without "just cause or excuse?" If it was bona fide done in the use of a man's own property, in the exercise of a man's own trade, such legal justification would, I think, exist not the less because what was done might seem to others to be selfish or unreasonable: see the summing up of ERLE, J., and the judgment of the Queen's Bench in R. v. Rowlands (22). But such legal justification would not exist when the act was merely done with the intention of causing temporal harm, without reference to one's own lawful gain, or the lawful enjoyment of one's own rights. The good sense of the tribunal which had to decide would have to analyse the circumstances and to discover on which side of the line each case fell. But if the real object were to enjoy what was one's own or to acquire for one's self some advantage in one's property or trade, and what was done was done honestly, peaceably, and without any of the illegal acts above referred to, it could not, in my opinion, properly be said that it was done without just cause or excuse. One may with advantage borrow for the benefit of traders what was

I said by ERLE, J., in R. v. Rowlands (22) (17 Q.B. at p. 687) of workmen and of masters: "The intention of the law is to allow them to follow the dictates of their own will with respect to their own actions and their own property; and either, I believe, has a right to study to promote his own advantage, or to combine with others to promote their mutual advantage."

Lastly, we are asked to hold the plaintiffs' conference or association illegal as being in restraint of trade. The term "illegal" here is a misleading one. Contracts, as they are called, in restraint of trade are not, in my opinion, illegal in any sense except that the law will not enforce them. It does not prohibit the making of such contracts—it merely declines after they have been made to recognise their validity. The law considers the disadvantage so imposed upon the contract a sufficient shelter to the public. The language of COMPTON, J., in Hilton v. Eckersley (1) is I think not to be supported. No action at common law will lie or ever has lain against any individual or individuals for entering into a contract merely because it is in restraint of trade. LORD ELDON's equity decision in Cousins v. Smith (23) is not very intelligible even if it be not open to the somewhat personal criticism passed on it by LORD CAMPBELL in his LIVES OF THE CHANCELLORS. If, indeed, it could be plainly proved that the mere formation of "conferences," "trusts," or "associations" such as these was always necessarily injurious to the public—a view which involves perhaps the disputable assumption that, in a country of free trade and one which is not under the iron régime of statutory monopolies, such confederations can ever be really successful—and if the evil of them were not sufficiently dealt with by the common law rule, which held such agreements to be void as distinct from holding them to be criminal, there might be some reason for thinking that the common law ought to discover within its arsenal of sound common-sense principles some further remedy commensurate with the mischief. Neither of these assumptions are, to my mind, at all evident, nor is it the province of judges to mould and stretch the law of conspiracy in order to keep pace with the calculations of political economy. If peaceable and honest combinations of capital for purposes of trade competition are to be struck at, it must, I think, be by legislation, for I do not see that they are under the ban of the common law.

In the result I agree with LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and differ with regret from the Master of the Rolls. The substance of my view is that competition, however severe and egotistical, if unattended by circumstances of dishonesty, intimidation, molestation, or such illegalities as I have above referred to, gives rise to no cause of action at common law. I myself should deem it to be a misfortune if we were to attempt to prescribe to the business world how honest and peaceable trade was to be carried on in a case where no such illegal elements as I have mentioned exist, or were to adopt some standard of judicial "reasonableness," or of "normal" prices, or "fair freights" to which commercial adventurers, otherwise innocent, were bound to conform. In my opinion, accordingly, this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

FRY, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The parties having agreed to leave the question of damages, if any, to reference or arbitration, I shall assume that the plaintiffs may show that in point of fact they have sustained damage from the defendants' acts. The plaintiffs allege that the conference was an unlawful conspiracy; that the agreement then entered into was carried into execution by the sending up of the three ships expressly to compete with the plaintiffs' vessels, by the circular, and the reduction of freights; that these acts were wrongful and have caused damage to them, and, consequently, were actionable.

I cannot doubt that whenever persons enter into an agreement which constitutes at law an indictable conspiracy, and that agreement is carried into execution by the conspirators by means of an unlawful act or acts which produce private injury to some person, that person has a cause of action against the conspirators. Was the agreement in the present case an unlawful conspiracy? TINDAL, C.J., speaking for the judges attending the House of Lords in O'Connell v. R. (19), said (11 Cl. & Fin. at p. 233):

"The crime of conspiracy is complete if two or more than two should agree to do an illegal thing—i.e., to effect something in itself unlawful, or to effect by unlawful means something which in itself may be indifferent or even lawful."

"A conspiracy consists in the agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means."

In all cases, therefore, a conspiracy is an agreement to do an unlawful act. It is immaterial whether that act be (a) the principal object and end of the agreement, as an agreement to kill, or (b) a subordinate act towards the principal object, as in an agreement to support a true title by forged deeds or suborned witnesses. Again, the act may be unlawful (a) because it would be unlawful in each of the agreeing parties even if he did it alone; or (b) because, though lawful in one, it is unlawful in two or more.

The first inquiry then which arises is this: Was the principal object and end of the agreement illegal? I answer that that object and end was the acquisition of gain by the defendants. That is lawful, and I suppose even commendable according to the law of this country, provided the means used be lawful. What, then, were the means intended to be used? They were, as I have already said, the exclusion of competition in the remoter future by severe competition in the near future. Was that lawful or unlawful? It is not necessary to consider whether competition directed by one man or by a combination of men against

A another man, if instigated and put in motion from mere malice and ill-will towards him, as a means of doing him ill-service and for no benefit to the doer would or would not be unlawful or actionable. There is in the present case no evidence of express malice or of any activity of the defendants against the plaintiffs except as rival and competing shipowners. The defendants did not aim at any general injury of the plaintiffs' trade, or any reduction of them to poverty or insolvency; they only desired to drive them from particular parts where the defendants conceived that the plaintiffs' presence interfered with their own gain; the damage B to be inflicted on the plaintiffs was to be strictly limited by the gain which the defendants desired to win for themselves. In the observations I am about to make I shall, therefore, lay out of consideration the case of competition used as a mere engine of malice even where I do not in terms repeat the exception. I will only add on this part of the case that the charge of ERLE, J., in R. v. Rowlands (22) (17 Q.B. at p. 687, n.) draws the same distinction which I have taken between combinations to promote the interests of those who combine and combinations of which the hurt of another is the immediate purpose.

C We have then to inquire whether mere competition directed by one man against another is ever unlawful. It was argued that the plaintiffs have a legal right to carry on their trade, and that to deprive them of that right by any means is a wrong. But the right of the plaintiffs to trade is, not an absolute, but a qualified right—a right conditioned by the like right in the defendants and all Her Majesty's subjects, and a right therefore to trade subject to competition. I know no limits to the right of competition in the defendants; I mean no D limits in law; I am not speaking of morals or good manners. To draw a line between fair and unfair competition, between what is reasonable and unreasonable, passes the power of the courts. Competition exists when two or more persons seek to possess or to enjoy the same thing; it follows that the success of one must be the failure of another, and no principle of law enables us to interfere with or to moderate that success or that failure so long as it is due to mere competition. I say mere competition for I do not doubt that it is unlawful and actionable for one man to interfere with another's trade by fraud or misrepresentation, or by E molesting his customers or those who would be his customers whether by physical obstruction or moral intimidation. Garret v. Taylor (14); Tarleton v. M'Gawley (10); Keeble v. Hickeringill (3); Carrington v. Taylor (13), are all cases of interference by physical acts, driving away either the birds or the customers from the plaintiffs' places of business. Other cases were cited in which one man had persuaded another who is under some contract of service to a third to break that contract to the damage of such third person, and the persuasion has been held actionable. But no case has been or I believe can be cited where the only means used F by the defendant to injure the plaintiff has been competition pure and simple. I think that if we were now to hold interference by mere competition unlawful we should be laying down law both novel and at variance with that which modern legislation has shown to be the present policy of the State.

But if one man may by competition strive to drive his rivals out of the field, is it lawful or unlawful for several persons to combine together to drive from the field their competitor in G trade? It is said that such an agreement is in restraint of trade, and, therefore, illegal. Be it so. But in what sense is the word "illegal" used in such a proposition? In my opinion, it means that the agreement is one upon which no action can be sustained and no relief obtained at law or in equity, but it does not mean that the entering into the agreement is either indictable or actionable. The authorities on this point are, I think, with a single exception, uniform. In Mitchel v. Reynolds (25) PARKER, C.J., in discussing contracts in restraint of trade, says:

H "It is not a reason against them that they are against law, I mean in a proper sense, for in an improper sense they are."

In Price v. Green (26) PATTESON, J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber upon a covenant held void as in restraint of trade, said expressly that it was "void only, not illegal." In Hilton v. Eckersley (1) the bond was addressed, not as in Mitchel v. Reynolds (25), I only to negative acts, such as not trading, but to positive acts, such as carrying on works under particular directions and closing the works at the dictation of a majority of the combining owners. In this case all the judges both in the Court of Queen's Bench and the Exchequer Chamber held that the bond could not be enforced, but CROMPTON, J., alone thought it created an indictable offence, LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., and ERLE, J., expressing an opposite opinion, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber carefully abstaining from expressing any opinion on the point. The language of all the judges in Hornby v. Close (27) and Farrer v. Close (28) is consonant with that of LORD CAMPBELL and ERLE, J., in Hilton v. Eckersley (1); and CROMPTON, J., is, I believe the only judge who has ever hitherto held such contracts illegal as well as void.

If every agreement in restraint of trade were not only void but unlawful in the stricter sense of the word, it would follow that, as every agreement must be at least between two persons, every such agreement would constitute an indictable offence, and yet not a single case has been cited of a conspiracy constituted by a mere agreement between two persons in undue restraint of the trade of one of the contractors. This silence of the books is very significant. It was forcibly urged upon us that combinations like the present are in their nature calculated to interfere with the course of trade, and that they are, therefore, so directly opposed to the interest which the State has in freedom of trade and in that competition which is said to be the life of trade, that they must be indictable. It is plain that the intention and object of the combination before us is to check competition; but the means it uses is competition, and it is difficult, if not impossible, to weigh against one another the probabilities of the employment of competition, on the one hand, and its suppression, on the other; nor is it easy to say how far the success of the combination would arouse in others the desire to share in its benefits and by competition to force a way into the magic circle. In Wickens v. Evans (29) it was suggested that the brewers or distillers of London might enter into an agreement to divide the metropolis into districts, the effect of which might be to supply the public with an inferior commodity at a higher price. This argument was met by HULLOCK, B., by this observation (3 Y. & J. at p. 330):

"If the brewers or distillers of London were to come to the agreement suggested, many other persons would soon be found to prevent the result anticipated, and the consequence would perhaps be that the public would obtain the articles they deal in at a cheaper rate."

A similar observation may be made in the present instance and corroborated by what has actually happened. For the case before us strikingly illustrates the difficulty of foretelling the probable results of such a combination in the public interest. In fact, the competition between the plaintiffs and the defendants in May and June, 1885, brought down the freights from Hankow to the benefit, it must be supposed, of the consumer in England. The conference came to an end in August, 1885, and in the summer of 1886 the rate of freight from Hankow was determined by free competition in an open market, in which the defendants were competing with one another.

But I do not rest my conclusion on any speculations as to the probable effect of such agreements as the one before us, but on this—that the combination, if in restraint of trade, is primâ facie void only and not illegal; that no statute in force makes such competition criminal; and that the policy of our law, as at present declared by the legislature, is against all fetters on combination and competition unaccompanied by violence or fraud or other like injurious acts. The ancient common law of this country and the statutes with reference to the acts known as badgering, forestalling, regrating, and engrossing indicated the mind of the legislature and of the judges that certain large operations in goods which interfered with the more ordinary course of trade were injurious to the public; and they were held criminal accordingly. But early in the reign of George III, the mind of the legislature showed symptoms of change in this matter and the penal statutes were repealed (12 Geo. 3, c. 71), and the common law was left to its unaided operation. This repealing statute contains in the preamble the statement that it had been found by experience that the restraint laid by several statutes upon the dealing in corn, meal, flour, cattle, and sundry other sorts of victuals, by preventing a free trade in the said commodities, had a tendency to discourage the growth and to enhance the price of the same. This statement is very noteworthy. It contains a confession of failure in the past, the indication of a new policy for the future. And this new policy has been more clearly declared and acted upon in the present reign, for the legislature has by 7 & 8 Vict., c. 24, altered the common law by utterly abolishing the several offences of badgering, engrossing, forestalling, and regrating. At the same time this repeal was accompanied by a proviso that nothing in the Act contained should apply to the offence of knowingly and fraudulently spreading, or conspiring to spread, any false rumour with intent to enhance or decri the price of any goods or merchandise, or to the offence of preventing, or endeavouring to prevent, by force or threats, any goods, wares, or merchandise being brought to any fair or market, but that every such offence might be punished as if this Act had not been made. The comparison of the operative part of the statute with this proviso goes far to draw the line between lawful and unlawful interference with the ordinary course of trade or of the market.

A consideration of the statutes relative to trade unions leads me to a similar conclusion. It is not necessary to consider in detail the provisions of the Trade Union Acts, 1871 and 1876, but one of their principal results was to enlarge the power of combination between workmen and workmen, and between masters and masters, for the purpose of maintaining and enforcing their respective interests, and to remove the objection of being in restraint of trade to

A which some of such combinations had been obnoxious. But while the legislature thus set masters and men respectively free to combine, they re-asserted the illegality of using violence, threats, molestation, obstruction, or coercion; and here, again, the contrast between the two pieces of legislation which stand side by side in the statute-book, the one declaring mere combinations lawful, and the other declaring violence and other like acts unlawful, helps to draw the line in the same direction as does the legislation in respect of trade combinations: cf. the Trade Union Act, 1871, and the [repealed] Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1871. Thus the stream of modern legislation runs strongly in favour of allowing great combinations of persons interested in trade and intended to govern or regulate the proceedings of large bodies of men, and thus necessarily to interfere with what would have been the course of trade if unaffected by such combinations. I, therefore, conclude that the combination in the present case cannot be held illegal as opposed to the policy of the law.

It remains to inquire whether the authorities assist in the decision of the question before us. As regards an individual, I have already pointed out that for one man to interfere with the lawful trade or business of another by molestation or any physical interference, or by fraud or misrepresentation, may be an actionable wrong. But no authority appears to show that for one man to injure the business of another by mere competition, even though it may be successfully directed to driving the rival out of the town where he dwells, or out of the business which he carries on, is actionable. And the silence of the books is strong evidence that such acts are not actionable. With regard to like acts done by a combination of persons, the authorities are not very numerous. There are certain general statements in text-books, of which the following passage in HAWKINS' PLEAS OF THE CROWN (vol. 1, p. 446), may be taken as a fair specimen:

"There can be no doubt but that all confederacies whatsoever, wrongfully to prejudice a third person, are highly criminal at common law, as where divers persons confederate together by indirect means to impoverish a third person."

E For this proposition HAWKINS cites authorities relative to two cases—first, R. v. Kimberty and North (30), which was a conspiracy to indict the prosecutor for having begotten a bastard child on the body of one of the conspirators—a case, therefore, which has nothing to do with the question now in hand. Secondly, R. v. Sterling (31), in which the indictment charged certain brewers of London with a conspiracy to refuse to sell small beer, with a view to impoverish the excisemen, and with intent to move the common people to pull down the Excise house, and to bring the excisemen into hatred of the people, and to impoverish and disable them from paying their rent to the King. The defendants were found guilty of counselling and assembling to impoverish the excisemen, and not guilty of the residue; and thereupon ultimately judgment went for the Crown. The real ground of the decision was, as stated by HOLT, C.J., in R. v. Daniell (32), that the offence of the defendant was of a public nature, and levelled at the government, and it is, therefore, no authority in respect of a combination which has no such object or effect. But one argument as it appears in SIDERFIN'S REPORTS (1 Sid. 174) is important. It was urged for the defendants that it was not an offence punishable by our law for one man to depauperate another, with a view to enrich himself, by selling commodities at cheaper rates. The court did not deny this proposition, but drew a distinction based upon the allegations of the information, which were supported by the verdict, that the Excise was parcel of the revenue of the King, and that to impoverish the excisemen was to render them incapable of paying these revenues to the King. So far, therefore, as the case goes, it is an authority rather for the defendants than for the plaintiffs.

H The next case that seems relevant is R. v. Eccles (33), before LORD MANSFIELD and the Court of King's Bench. The defendant and six other persons had been convicted on two counts, charging that the defendants and others, devising unlawfully and by indirect means to impoverish one Booth, and to hinder him from exercising the trade of a tailor, conspired by wrongful and indirect means to impoverish him, and to hinder him from exercising his said business; and the defendants, according to their said conspiracy, did so hinder him. It was moved, in arrest of judgment, that the means by which the mischief was to be effected ought to have been set out, but the indictment was held sufficient. The nature of the acts done by the defendants does not appear, nor is it easy to learn precisely on what principles the court proceeded. LORD ELLENBOROUGH in R. v. Turner (34) said that the case seemed to have been determined on the ground of restraint of trade, in which case it would probably be no authority since the legislation of this reign with reference to trade unions. If regarded as an authority merely on the sufficiency of the indictments, it appears open to some question. In any event, it throws no clear light on the matter now for decision. Cousins v. Smith (23) is probably not applicable, since it proceeded on the view of a court of equity of forestalling and regrating, and those practices are not now unlawful. The equitable shadow of these crimes must, I think, have disappeared from the crimes themselves. A

These are, so far as I am aware, all the relevant authorities, and none of them appears to me to support the proposition that mere competition of one set of men against another man, carried on for the purpose of gain, and not out of actual malice, is actionable, even though intended to drive the rival in trade away from his place of business, and though that intention be actually carried into effect. For these reasons, I hold that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs. B

Re LACON. LACON v. LACON

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.), April 20, 21, 1891]

Portions—Double portions—Presumption against—Need for both gifts to be in nature of portions—Rebuttal of presumption—Circumstances showing that earlier gift not intended as advancement.

For the presumption to arise of the satisfaction by a gift by father to son inter vivos of a legacy given by the father to the son by his will both gifts must be in the nature of a portion, e.g., a gift given to establish the son in life. If both gifts are in the nature of portions, the presumption arises that the father intended that the gift inter vivos should be an advancement of the gift subsequently given by the will, a presumption which, it is said, is made in favour of equality among children. That presumption (which, per LINDLEY, L.J., is not a very strong one) is rebutted where the circumstances of the case show that the gift given during lifetime was not intended as an advancement of the bequest. D

Per BOWEN, L.J.: Where there is a substantial and material difference between a gift inter vivos and a gift under the will the courts have abstained from treating one as an advancement in respect of the other. E

Appeal from a decision of ROMER, J., in an action for a declaration.

F By his will, dated Dec. 22, 1884, Sir Edmund Henry Knowles Lacon devised and bequeathed all his parts or shares, estate and interest of and in the trade or business of a brewer, then carried on by him in Great Yarmouth, the city of London, and elsewhere, in copartnership, under the style or firm of "Sir Edmund Lacon & Sons, the Great Yarmouth Brewery," and of and in all messuages, tenements, beer-houses, public-houses, buildings, lands, and other hereditaments of every tenure, whereon such trade or business should at the time of his death be carried on, or

G which should then belong to the copartnership (with certain immaterial exceptions), and of and in all the engines, machinery, fixtures, and all other effects and things which at the time of his death should be used in the business, and the goodwill and book-debts, unto his sons, Thomas Beecroft Ussher Lacon, Henry Sidney Hammett Lacon, and Ernest de Montesquieu Lacon, in equal shares, as tenants in common. At the date of his will the testator was entitled to twenty-one equal

H twenty-fourth shares in the copartnership business. From 1874 Ernest Lacon was actively employed in the London branch business at a salary, but his two brothers were not engaged in the business in any way. In 1884, on the death of the manager, he became manager at a salary of £1,000 a year. The business having increased, and with it the duties and responsibilities, Ernest Lacon applied to his father, the testator, for an increased salary. To this the testator at first made no

I response, but in 1886, after the death of one of the partners, the testator informed his son that a fresh partnership arrangement was in contemplation, and that he should be admitted as a partner, and receive two equal twenty-fourth shares upon such admission.

Ernest Lacon assented to this, and signed the new articles of partnership, dated Dec. 19, 1887. He also refunded to the partnership the salary received by him from September, 1886, to September, 1887. The articles of partnership contained a recital to the effect that the testator had assigned or made over two of his twenty-one shares to Ernest Lacon, and, although no deed of assignment was actually executed, he was credited with those two shares in the partnership books, and duly received a corresponding proportion of the net profits upon the yearly division of profit. This proportion largely exceeded his former salary. In 1889 the testator died, without having altered his will, and thereupon this action was brought by Thomas Lacon against Ernest Lacon, Henry Lacon, and Edward P. Youell (an executor of the will). A

By his statement of claim the plaintiff submitted that, by the assignment and taking over of the two shares, in 1887, the gift in the will to the defendant Ernest Lacon was adeemed to the extent of such two shares, and he was only entitled to five of the testator's remaining nineteen shares. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that he was entitled to seven nineteenth shares. By his defence Ernest Lacon stated that the two shares were intended to be a remuneration for his services as acting partner, and not as an advancement by way of portion; that there was an actual purchase for value of the two shares from the testator; and, that, therefore, there could be no case of ademption. In 1891 ROMER, J., decided that the defendant, Ernest Lacon, did not become a purchaser for value of the two shares which he obtained on being admitted a partner, but that they were a gift to him from the testator. In his Lordship's opinion there was nothing in the case to rebut the presumption against double portions to which the circumstances gave rise. The plaintiff was, therefore, entitled to the declaration for which he asked. The defendant, Ernest Lacon, appealed. B

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised by this case is one of importance, and one of difficulty. It is in form an appeal from a decision of ROMER, J., making a declaration to the effect that the shares in the brewery which have been referred to, are divisible in sevenths. The defendant, Mr. Ernest Lacon, contends that he is entitled to eight and a third shares, and two of his brothers to six and a third shares each. F

The point depends upon what is called the presumption against double portions. Before going into the facts, I may state at once what that doctrine is. I cannot do better than read the judgment of LORD ELDON in Ex parte Pye (1). He says this (18 Ves. at p. 151): G

"Without going through all the cases that were cited and those referred to in them, having compared the case in ATKYNS [Shudal v. Jekyll (2)] with manuscript notes of that case and looked into some other cases, one in AMBLER [Watson v. Earl of Lincoln (3)], and some earlier, I may state, as the unquestionable doctrine of the court, that where a parent gives a legacy to a child not stating the purpose with reference to which he gives it, the court understands him as giving a portion; and, by a sort of artificial rule, in the application of which legitimate children have been very harshly treated, upon an artificial notion that the father is paying a debt of nature, and a sort of feeling upon what is called a leaning against double portions, if the father afterwards advances a portion on the marriage of that child, though of less amount, it is a satisfaction of the whole or in part." H

He goes on to say what has been done in some of the cases. I

What we have to consider are, first, the will of the late Sir Edmund Lacon, and, secondly, some partnership articles which were entered into by him, after the date of his will, and the circumstances under which those articles were entered into. What we have to see is whether this is a case in which there are two portions, and also whether, assuming that there are two portions, and assuming, therefore, that the presumption to which I have referred arises, there are, or are not, circumstances in this case which rebut that presumption. The will I can run through shortly, for

A nothing turns upon the construction of it. The testator had four sons and two daughters. He had two businesses. He had a banking business at Norwich and at Yarmouth, and he had a brewery business at Yarmouth. He leaves his banking business (besides other property to which I need not refer) to his eldest son, the present baronet, of whom I need say nothing more. He leaves his brewery business, in which he had twenty-one out of twenty-four shares, to his younger children, Thomas, Henry, and Ernest. He then, after making various bequests in favour of his daughters and so on (which I pass over), bequeaths the residue of his property among all his children. That is the general scheme of the will. To use LORD ELDON's language in Ex parte Pye (1), there is nothing in the will which enables us to say the purpose for which these brewery shares were given to the three sons. In 1884 the third son, Ernest, was being brought up to the brewery business. He was being trained by his father to attend to that business, with a view ultimately, no doubt, of becoming a partner in it. The same observation is not true of the eldest son. It is not true of the two intermediate sons. It was the youngest son, and the youngest son alone, who was brought up to this business. Having, I suppose, become useful he was paid a salary of £500 a year.

B In 1887 his salary was £1,000 a year. In that year it was considered desirable that some modifications should be made in the partnership in the brewery business. There had to be modifications as regarded the provision for Mr. Nightingale, one of the partners, and it appears from the evidence that the son Ernest was urging his father to increase his salary. That salary was not paid by the father. It was paid by the firm, though, of course, the father (having so large a share in the business) was the principal paymaster. It seems from the evidence which we have E (which is the evidence of Mr. Ernest Lacon and also the evidence of Mr. Waters, the testator's solicitor) that there was a discussion—perhaps, however, it would be hardly right to call it a "discussion" because the father seems to have held his tongue; being a very reticent man, he did not discuss much, but he listened to the statements made by Ernest, and he so far acquiesced that upon one occasion, when Ernest was pressing his father for an increase of the allowance, his father said, "I have made you a partner." F The evidence of Mr. Waters, the solicitor, tends to show conclusively that what the father was doing, among other things, unquestionably was to increase the allowance to his son Ernest. He thought at one time he would do that sufficiently by giving him one share (Mr. Waters tells us that), and then he changed his mind and told Mr. Waters he would give him two shares. Then there was a question as to what the effect of that would be upon the allowance. That question arose by reason of a G query put into the draft by Mr. Nightingale's solicitor as to Mr. Nightingale's allowance. The matter as to Mr. Ernest Lacon's allowance was brought to the father's attention, and he said at once: "The allowance will have to be given up. The shares are in substitution for that."

H So it came about that, in 1887, Mr. Ernest Lacon ceased to be a salaried clerk or assistant, or whatever he was, in the concern, and became a partner in respect of two twenty-fourth shares which had been given him by his father. They were not contributed by the other partners; they came out of the father's twenty-one twenty-fourth shares. The partnership articles recite the arrangement in this way. Then they recite an agreement (this is common form) that a partnership should be constituted between the parties thereto; and the value of the two shares given to I Ernest is stated at the sum of £21,500. That is the capital sum, the sum at which these two shares are to be treated in the books, I suppose. We have the usual partnership articles between the partners, and there is nothing of any importance that I know of until we come to cl. 28. The son who is taken in is bound to attend to the business and devote his whole time to it. That is more or less common form, and then cl. 28 is addressed to the introduction by the father of his sons or legatees as partners under his will. It provides:

"if any partner shall die during the continuance of the partnership his executors or legatees shall be at liberty, within four months, to give notice in writing of their intention to discontinue the partnership."

If, however, the executors, administrators, or legatees of a deceased partner shall desire to continue in the partnership, or shall not give notice to discontinue they shall be and be considered as partners and be admitted partners into the partnership

"in the place of the deceased partner, and in respect of his share and interest therein, upon the terms of these presents so far as the same shall be applicable to the altered circumstances then existing, and so that the new partners or partner admitted under this clause shall have all the rights and powers of the deceased partner in whose place they or he shall be substituted (save and except that they or he shall not be acting partners or partner without the consent of the other partners or partner), and the share and interest of the deceased partner and the share of profits coming to such new partners (if more than one) shall be divided amongst such new partners in shares and proportions as they may be entitled thereto, and may mutually agree upon."

There is a proviso that

"every partner admitted under this clause shall execute a deed covenanting with the other partners or partner for the time being jointly and separately to perform and observe the provisions of these presents so far as the same shall be applicable."

A further proviso provides that, if the surviving partners or partner refuse "to admit into partnership as acting partners or partner the executors, administrators, or legatees of the deceased partner claiming admission under the clause, then the said executors, administrators, or legatees shall have the option, to be exercised in manner hereinafter mentioned, within two calendar months after such refusal, of purchasing the shares and interest of the surviving partners or partner in the capital and assets (including the goodwill) of the partnership."

It is a very curious clause.

What is the effect of that? The effect is that it was competent for the testator to bequeath his shares to anybody he liked—to sons or to anybody else, that the legatees should thereupon be at liberty to become partners, and that if they became partners they would be bound to attend to the business unless the survivors said that they should not. It is not intended that these legatees could become partners and escape the duty and burden of working as acting partners. The option of working or not working would not be on them, but on the survivors. Ernest Lacon is certainly given rights under this deed as a partner admitted under the deed which he would not have, and which his brothers would not have, if they were claiming simply under the will. About eight or nine months after this the testator died without having altered his will. Upon the will and the deed Ernest Lacon's position is unassailable. He has got two shares under the deed. He has got under the will one-third of all the remaining shares of his father. As a matter of construction there is no difficulty about it and no controversy about it. But then comes in the presumption against double portions, and his brothers say that, by reason of the presumption against double portions, Ernest Lacon must treat the two shares which their father gave him in 1887 as given him in anticipation of and on account of and in part satisfaction of the seven shares which he would have taken, and which they would all have taken, if no provision had been made for him. That rests upon the presumption.

On the question whether these two provisions—the one by the will and the one by the deed—are portions, it appears to me that there is very considerable difficulty in saying that they are not. Certainly the purpose for which a provision is given is important, as appears from the language of LORD ELDON in Ex parte Pye (1). I think that what the learned lord said about "purpose" in considering the nature

A of a provision by will is a point reasonably applicable to a provision made by a deed, instrument, or will. But, assuming that these two provisions are both portions (and having regard, as I have said, to the language used in the cases upon this subject, and especially of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Taylor v. Taylor (4), I shall assume that they are portions), the question then arises whether there is or is not, under the circumstances of this case, enough to rebut the presumption
B that these shares are to be taken as given on account of and in anticipation of and in part satisfaction of what otherwise would have been taken if they had not been given by the testator in his lifetime.

Here we differ from ROMER, J. We think that the circumstances here are peculiar; and we think that there are circumstances sufficient to indicate not simply an intention on the part of the father to anticipate the provision which he
C had made to one of his sons, but an intention and desire to prefer that one son to the others, not only in point of time but in point of the provision and the nature of the provision which he was making. It is, to my mind, very significant that this son alone had been brought up in the business. It is very significant that this provision was made for that son when he was asking for a further advance of salary. As Mr. Water's evidence and Ernest Lacon's own evidence (though, of course, that must be taken as interested evidence) goes to show, it was one method of increasing his allowance. It was not simply giving him now what he would have when his father died. It was something very different. It was that and a great deal more. When we consider that it was to the advantage of the family that one son at all events should be brought up in the business and be there when his father
E died and ceased to be a partner, it appears to me that there is amply enough for us to say that the presumption (which is not a very strong one) is rebutted, and that, looking at what was done in 1887 and the reasons which brought about what was done, the purpose which the testator had in his mind, or apparently had when he re-cast those partnership articles in 1887, was deliberately to prefer Ernest not only in point of time but in point of amount also. I think, therefore, that the F appeal ought to be allowed.

BOWEN, L.J.—The question we have to decide is whether it was the intention of the father that the two shares which were received by Ernest Lacon during his father's lifetime should be received by him as an advancement against the shares which he was to receive under the will on the father's death. In order to establish
G that intention the plaintiff has invoked what is called the doctrine of double portions—a doctrine which is, no doubt, originally judge-made, and is established by this court, but respecting which I should be the last person to endeavour to introduce any subtle or frivolous distinction. The doctrine, so far as it applies to a case of this peculiar character, seems to me to have been made clear to the world by the judgment of LORD COTTENHAM in Pym v. Lockyer (5), which I will read
H because it will make the few remarks that I am about to offer perhaps clearer than they otherwise would be. This I take substantially to be the law. LORD COTTENHAM says (5 My. & Cr. at p. 46):

“A father, who makes his will, dividing his property amongst his children, must be supposed to have decided what, under the then existing circumstances, ought to be the portion of each child, not with reference to the wants of each,
I but attributing to each the share of the whole which, with reference to the wants of all, each ought to possess. If subsequently, upon the marriage of any one of them, it becomes necessary or expedient to advance a portion for such child, what reason is there for assuming that the apportionment between all ought therefore to be disturbed? The advancement must naturally be supposed to be of the particular child's portion; and so the rule assumes, as it precludes the child advanced from claiming the sum given by the will as well as the sum advanced.”

To establish a case for the application of this rule as to double portions, there must be two matters made out, and it will be seen upon analysis that there are two presumptions which are applied, and not one. In the first place, both of the gifts or donations must be gifts, and gifts in the nature of a portion. The first presumption here arises. It is said that whatever gifts are made by the father which it may be supposed will have to be distributed among the children or are given by the father to one child with a view to establishing him in life, are presumed to be portions within the meaning of the rule. We have here to ask ourselves, in the first place, whether these two shares which were received by Ernest Lacon during the lifetime of his father were received under such circumstances as to justify their being treated and considered as a portion. But supposing both are gifts in the nature of portions, then comes a further question for the solution of which a further presumption is invoked. That question is whether it is intended that the former gift or portion shall take the place of an advancement of the gift which is given by the will. There the presumption which is invoked to answer the question is that the former gift, the gift inter vivos, is intended as an advancement pro tanto of the gift under the bequest. That is a presumption which, it is said, is made in favour of equality among children, it being the view of the law that equality is what the father, in dealing with his children, would, in most cases, presumably intend. This is a presumption which may be rebutted. The circumstances may show that a gift given during the lifetime is not intended as an advancement of the bequest. Circumstances may show—to put it slightly differently—that equality was not the intention of the father.

The two questions, first, whether the gifts are both given in the way of portions, and, secondly, whether it was intended by the father that the first gift should be an advancement in satisfaction of the second, may well run together, and be blended together; and, in my opinion, this is just the case in which they do. I myself am not satisfied, to begin with, that the former gift, the gift of the two shares—I call it a “gift” although perhaps the expression “gift” is not exactly an appropriate term—which was made by the father in his lifetime to Ernest Lacon was in the nature of a portion within the meaning of the rule. To my mind the circumstances of the case displace the notion that the father here was giving them simply by way of advancement to the son. Secondly, I think (for reasons which I will give in a moment) that here in every view the presumption in favour of equality is rebutted by the circumstances of the case. The circumstances show that the gift given during the lifetime was not intended as an advancement of the bequest. The son had been thirteen years in the firm, at first in a subordinate position, and afterwards as the manager of the London business, receiving as salary £1,000 a year. He had acquired experience, and he had earned confidence. He had become a person in 1887 unquestionably of use and value to the firm. He was a person who, if he had not been a son, might have dreamed, at all events not unreasonably, of in time, and at no very distant time, being promoted to a share in the business of the firm. In 1887 he wished for an increase of salary, and was in such a position that he could press it upon his father. Doubtless he would also look to be a partner at some time or another in the house.

A person in that position, who in the business of his father has done service and substantial service, might well, if a favourable view was taken of it, be rewarded with a share or shares. When Ernest Lacon received the shares from his father he received what, perhaps, his father would have given with much more hesitation, or which, perhaps, he would not have given at all, if the relationship of father and son had not existed. He received what can hardly be characterised as mere bounty. It is not a pure gift, although the element of free liberality enters into it. He may, perhaps, be given more than he deserves, but he deserves something. It is a portion in the sense that it is a provision which the father would not have made if the recipient had not been his son. But it is a portion which has in part been earned by previous services, and which is intended of course to be justified by services in the future. I doubt whether, under such circumstances, it would be

A safe to say that the two shares which are bestowed upon the son were simply a portion.

But the further question remains whether, assuming the two shares to be a gift in the way of a portion, we can see reason sufficient to displace the presumption of double portions. In other words, whether there is not a reason here from which we may safely infer that the gift of the two shares was not intended as an advancement pro tanto of the bequest. These shares were active shares; they were shares which actually gave the son a veto upon introduction at a later date, the period of which was perfectly uncertain and which might be delayed for years, of his other brothers. He had a grant of power and place given to him in the firm of a kind wholly incommensurate with the gift which he was to receive under the will. That grant and gift to him, treating it as a grant and gift, to my mind being wholly incommensurate with the gift under the will, is coloured with such a difference as to render it impossible for us to presume with safety that the gift of the shares was intended in any way to be an advancement towards the bequest. It seems to me to be exactly upon that kind of reasoning the courts have abstained, when there is a substantial and material difference between a gift inter vivos and a gift under the will, from treating one as an advancement in respect of the other. The doctrine of double portions must be applied faithfully wherever it is found to be equitable; but, on the other hand, it is not to be extended. The circumstances of this case convince me that the dealing between the father and the son in the year 1887 was not intended in any way by the father to be an advancement towards what the son was to receive under the will, and that it was not intended as a part performance of the distribution which the will was designed by the father to make of what the father should leave at his death. Upon these grounds I agree that the judgment of the learned judge of the court below ought to be reversed, although, like LINDLEY, L.J., I agree in thinking that this is a very delicate and difficult case, and I am not surprised that judges should not be of one mind upon the subject.

KAY, L.J.—The question is: What was the intention of the father in this case? Did he intend, when he made this gift (if it is to be called a gift) to his youngest son in his lifetime, that it should be taken as an anticipation of the provision that he, at that time, had made by the will, which ultimately became operative on his death? There is a rule which has been referred to which is a guide where you can have no other guide, in order to find out what the intention was. The rule is that, if there are two provisions, the one made by the will and the other in the lifetime of the testator, or what, in equity, are ordinarily called "portions," then arises the presumption that one portion is made in part satisfaction of the other. If that presumption arises and is not rebutted, the donee has to bring into hotchpot that portion which he received in his lifetime, and in that way deduct it from that which he otherwise would take under the will.

By this will it is quite clear. I think, that the provision which was made for this and the other younger sons by dividing among them the testator's share and interest which he might have at his death in his brewery business, was in the nature of a "portion" for each of those children. I take it that, for the purpose of determining that question, a "portion" means such a share of the father's personal property as he intends to be a provision for that son, or, as in this case, a substantial part of the provision for that son. The will was conceived in this way so far as these younger sons are concerned. The shares which the testator might have at his death in the brewery business, and in the property comprised in that business, were to be divided equally among them. Besides that, there was a certain share of the residue of the testator's property given to each, and also their names came in with a series of limitations of strict settlement of the testator's real estate. Still, I do not doubt myself that these shares of the business (which seems to have been a valuable and extensive business) were such a substantial part of the provision made for the younger sons that a gift among them may properly be considered as coming within the definition of "portions" for those children.

The next question is: Was the gift made of two twenty-fourth shares in that same business by the testator in his lifetime to his youngest son, Ernest, a provision by way of portion? On that subject, I confess I have the same doubt which the other members of the court have expressed. One must look carefully at the circumstances under which that provision was made, and what presses very much upon my mind is that this youngest son had been for thirteen years engaged as a clerk and ultimately as a salaried manager of the London branch of that brewery business. Before this gift (if it be, I repeat, a "gift") of the shares was made to him, he went to his father and pressed him, not for a share in the partnership, but for an increase in his salary. The father, it is said, was a very reticent man, and this application was renewed at different times, and on one occasion when the conversation took place he asked his son to visit him at his country house, evidently for the purpose of renewing the conversation, and in order that he might have an interval in which to make up his mind as to what he should do. The son did visit his father at his country house, and he details (and there is no attempt at contradiction of what he says) what took place between him and his father. According to his description his father certainly on that occasion maintained his character for reticence; but the son pressed him very much that his salary should be increased, and the father told him that he had come to the determination—I am not attempting to quote the precise words—instead of increasing his salary to give him two twenty-fourth shares in the business, and to make him an acting partner. The father indicated that that should take effect as from a date which had passed (I think fifteen months before), and that the son was to bring into account the salary which he had received in the meantime, taking a share of the profits from that back date.

That was the arrangement which the father made with the son in answer to repeated pressure from the son that he should have a larger remuneration for his work as manager of the business. To my mind, that indicates plainly that the father was satisfied that the son had become a valuable manager of a part of the business; that he evidently desired to comply with the son's request, and something more, because the profits of the shares which he gave amounted to a larger amount than the son expected or was asking for; and that he did so for the purpose of encouraging the son to carry on the management of the business and to be an acting partner in it. The father evidently considered that that was very much for the advantage of the business.

Let us consider what the effect of that was. What was done was this. A new deed of partnership was executed, and the other partners made no kind of objection to the same, and these two twenty-fourth shares were given to the son by diminishing to that extent the shares which the father had in the business. So that practically they came out of the father's own shares. There was an advantage in making this arrangement to the other partners because it relieved them of the payment of the salary which the business up to that time had been paying the son. From the time when this arrangement was made the remuneration of the son was in fact paid by the father, because the father handed over to him, as I have pointed out, two of his own shares. If the father was right—and I cannot for one moment doubt that he was right—in giving every possible encouragement to this son to continue as an acting partner in the business, then he was doing the best thing he could do for the objects of his bounty mentioned in his will, because he was doing what he thought was the best thing to do to secure that the business should be so carried on that at the time of his death it should be as valuable or more valuable—and probably it was—than it was at the time when he admitted the son into this partnership.

I am not satisfied that that is fairly to be considered a gift in the nature of a portion. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., as has been pointed out, attempted something like a definition in the case of what amounted to a portion within the meaning of the advancement clause in the Statute of Distributions. He held in that case that small sums of money did not amount to advancement for that purpose. But

A whether his definition applies to a case of this kind or not, I confess I think it would be a dangerous thing to say that in a case of this kind such a benefit given to the youngest son of the testator in the testator's lifetime was a gift of such a nature as to raise the presumption of double portions. Without expressing any final opinion, or saying more than that I seriously doubt that, I will proceed to the next question. If by any proper use of language this can be called an advancement by way of portion, then we have to consider whether the presumption that would arise that it was given in part of the provision which had been made by the father's will is or is not rebutted.

As I began by saying, it all comes round to this: What, on the whole of these facts, must be considered to have been the intention of the testator? Was it his intention to put this son, who was a skilled manager of the business and had learnt it by some thirteen years' experience, when he was admitted as a partner in the father's lifetime in consideration of that skill which he had shown, in a somewhat better position than the other younger sons of the testator in respect of the business? I cannot divest my mind of the conviction that the more reasonable conclusion is that the testator did intend, in consideration of the experience which he had of the son's capabilities in carrying on an important part of the business, to put him in a somewhat better position in respect of his interest in the business than the other younger children, who had never taken any part in the business at all. Observe (and it is important to observe) that the other younger children are all older than this youngest son, yet they were not admitted into the business during the father's lifetime at all. They were not experienced in the management of the business in any way. Why they were not does not appear. It may have been from some disinclination on their part, or it may have been because the father wished them not to take part in the business. Of that I know nothing, but the fact remains, that here it appears that the one brother was a skilled manager in the business, and the others, who are now seeking to invoke this doctrine of double portions against him, were not skilled managers in the business at all. It seems to me that, in respect of that fact that he was a skilled manager of the business, it is right and reasonable to suppose that the father intended that he should have this advantage which he gave to him in the father's lifetime.

I cannot help being moved a little by the consideration—though that of course by itself would not be enough to rebut the presumption—that the father never attempted to make any alteration in his will. There is a good deal to be said for the argument that those who are now insisting that the doctrine of double portions applies are trying to introduce it to alter the natural effect of the admission of this man as a partner in his father's lifetime and the provision made by the will. For all these reasons I agree with the other lords justices. I think that this is a case in which, if that doctrine applied at all—as to which I have said I have considerable doubt—it is completely rebutted when we examine carefully all the circumstances of the case, and that, therefore, Ernest, the son in question, is not bound to bring into hotchpot or account for the two twenty-fourth shares which he took in this partnership during his father's lifetime.

The manager of a theatre exhibited on the stage tableaux vivants, which were grouped and dressed in imitation of certain pictures, of which the copyright was in the appellant. The respondents, the proprietors and publisher of an illustrated newspaper, published sketches of the tableaux exhibited at the theatre.

D

Held: the sketches were not copies of the appellant's paintings, or of the design thereof, within s. 1 of the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862.

Per LORD WATSON: The idea created by a painting is something different from the design, and is not within the protection of the statute.

Notes. The Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, has been repealed. Copyright in paintings is now regulated by the Copyright Act, 1956, s. 3.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY, LOPES and DAVEY, L.JJ.), reported [1894] 3 Ch. 109.

The appellant, Hanfstaengl, a fine art publisher and dealer in works of art carrying on business in Munich, London and elsewhere, appealed from a decision of the Court of Appeal discharging an order of STIRLING J., granting him until trial of the action or until further order, an injunction restraining the respondents, E. Baines & Co. and E. J. Mansfield, the proprietors and publisher of the "Daily Graphic," from copying or colourably imitating or from printing, selling or exhibiting copies of certain of the appellant's copyright pictures and ordering (the appeal being treated by consent as the trial of the action) that the action should stand dismissed as against the respondents.

- A The pictures were first published in Munich after the conclusion of the Berne Convention in 1887, and the appellant was entitled to the exclusive copyright therein throughout the German empire and he contended that, by virtue of the International Copyright Act, 1886, and of an Order in Council made thereunder in 1887, he was entitled to the exclusive copyright in the works in the United Kingdom. The Empire Palace, Ltd., presented in their music-hall on the stage
- B within a solid gilt picture-frame representations of various pictures, the figures in which were living persons, the scenery being painted on canvas. The appellant alleged that these representations were copies of his pictures, and as such constituted an infringement of his copyright, and that the "Daily Graphic," in publishing sketches of such representations, had also infringed his copyright. The following questions were argued before STIRLING, J.: (i) whether the appellant, not being
- C registered as the proprietor of the pictures in this country, could maintain the action; (ii) whether, assuming him to be entitled to the copyright in the pictures, the extent of that right was to be determined by German or English law; and (iii) whether what the respondents had done was an infringement of the appellant's copyright under either the English or the German law, who decided all three points in favour of the appellant, and granted an injunction. The Court of Appeal reversed
- D the decision on the third point, holding that the sketches in the "Daily Graphic" were so rough and incomplete that they did not represent any of the artistic merits of the appellant's pictures.

- E Their Lordships took time for consideration.
Dec. 17, 1894. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The appellant is the owner of the copyright in certain paintings. An exhibition took place on the stage of the Empire Theatre of what were called living pictures. These were formed by living persons who had

F assumed the dress, attitude, and position of the figures to be found in the appellant's copyright paintings, and had been placed, as far as possible, in apparently the same surroundings. In short, the living picture was intended to be a representation of the artist's work. The respondents are the publishers of the "Daily Graphic" newspaper. They published, in their issue of Feb. 8, 1894, sketches of the living

G pictures, taken by one of their artists. These were accompanied by an account of the performance, and were intended to convey information, by pictorial means, of the entertainment to be witnessed at the theatre. The appellant complains that the sketches so published constitute an infringement of his copyright. STIRLING, J., came to this conclusion, but the Court of Appeal reversed his decision, and gave judgment for the respondents.

- H The copyright in paintings is regulated by the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, which, by s. 1, confers the sole and exclusive right of copying, engraving, reproducing, and multiplying the painting and the design thereof, and, by s. 6, imposes a penalty on any person who shall, without the consent of the proprietor of the copyright,

- I "repeat, copy, colourably imitate, or otherwise multiply for sale, hire, exhibition, or distribution, or cause or procure to be repeated, copied, colourably imitated, or otherwise multiplied for sale, hire, exhibition or distribution, any such work, or the design thereof."

The appellant's counsel felt it difficult to say that the alleged infringement was a copy or reproduction or multiplication of the appellant's paintings, but they relied on the words "or of the design thereof." And I think that the appellant cannot succeed in this action unless he can show that the respondents have copied the design of some or one of his paintings. It is obvious that the appellant cannot successfully claim to have a monopoly of every treatment of such common subjects as Love and Courtship, or Charity. I take these as examples. The paintings of which he alleges his copyright to have been infringed were all of this class, and it would be impossible to give the word "design," as used in the statute, so wide a meaning as to confer such a right as this. What is covered by that word must depend in each case upon the nature of the painting. A

The appellant puts his case in this way. The living pictures exhibited at the Empire Theatre were, he says, copies from the paintings of which he owns the copyright, and the sketches published in the respondents' paper were copies of these living pictures, therefore, they must be copies of the design, at least, of his copyright paintings. It is not accurate to say that the living pictures were copies of the paintings. It is admitted that the faces, at all events, were different. It is not shown that the countenances of the living persons who figured upon the stage bore any close resemblance to those depicted by the artist. In some cases this difference would be all-important. The skill of the artist might have been mainly devoted to this part of the picture, and the faces depicted might be of the very essence of the design. The other details might be so subordinated to these that even if a drawing showed some resemblance in other respects, yet, if the faces were different, no one would dream of saying that the one was a copy or reproduction of the other. On the other hand, there might be cases where the grouping of the figures and their accessories might be more important in comparison, and a change in the countenances represented might leave the design of the painting substantially the same. B C D

It must always be a question of fact whether what is complained of as an infringement is a copy of the design. I mention these merely as illustrations. It is impossible to lay down any hard-and-fast rule. I am far from saying that what is called a living picture might not be so arranged to represent an existing painting, that a photograph or drawing of the living picture would be a copy of the design of that painting. All I say is, that this must depend upon the character of the picture, and what is justly to be regarded as its design. E

It is not necessary to refer in detail to each of the sketches of which complaint is made. It is admitted that the one most favourable for the appellant's case is that representing "First Love." If he cannot succeed in showing that this picture infringes his copyright, it is out of the question that he should be entitled to relief in respect of any of the others. There is, no doubt, a resemblance between the sketch and the photograph from the painting. In each case a young man and a young woman are standing beside one another close to a stile or fence. In each case the woman is shading her head by a parasol, and the dress of the man is somewhat similar in the two. The idea suggested is, of course, the same; each represents "First Love"; but the idea of a young man courting a young woman at a country stile is of great antiquity. It has often formed the subject of pictorial representation. This cannot be said to be the design of the appellant's painting within the meaning of the Act. Much more must be comprehended than this. There can only be a copy of such a design if the treatment of the subject be the same. Comparing the sketch with the photograph from the painting, I do not think this can be said to be the case. The faces are different; the mode in which the woman's hair is arranged is different; the dress, especially in the case of the woman, is different; the pose is different; the attitudes are different; the background is different, and, in the case of the sketch, the foreground is wanting. F G H

In the artist's design all these things play a part, and though I do not say that a variation in one or even more of these respects would prevent the sketch being a copy of the design, yet, comparing the two and considering the design of the painting as a whole, I cannot avoid the conclusion that the sketch is not a copy of the painting or of the design thereof, and, therefore, that there has been no infringement. It is difficult, if not impossible, to put into words all the reasons which lead to the conclusion arrived at on such a question as that now before your Lordships. I have tried to indicate some of those which have led me to my I

A conclusion; but it depends really on the effect produced upon the mind by a study of the picture, and of that which is alleged to be a copy of it, or at least of its design. I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs.

B LORD WATSON.—The appellant has acquired the copyright of four pictures by foreign artists entitled “First Love,” “Loves me loves me not,” “Charity,” “Pets,” which he has reproduced and sold in this country as engravings or photographs, and he complains in this action that the respondents have published in the “Daily Graphic” certain sketches which he alleges to be copies or colourable imitations of these copyright works. In both courts below it was a matter of controversy whether under the Order in Council of Nov. 28, 1887, the appellant can claim the full privileges conferred by the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862. The judges of the Court of Appeal did not decide the point. They dealt with the case upon the assumption that the appellant was entitled to all the protection which is afforded by the Act, and they refused to grant an injunction, on the ground that none of the sketches complained of constituted an infringement of his copyright. The argument addressed to this House proceeded upon the same assumption; and I understand all your Lordships to be of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal is right.

The only question which your Lordships have found it necessary to determine appears to be mainly one of fact. It is, no doubt, necessary to ascertain the import of the statutory prohibition before considering whether it has been contravened; and so far legal construction may be involved. But the ascertaining of the statutory rule is, in my opinion, a very simple matter in comparison with the task of determining in some cases whether in point of fact one picture or drawing is a colourable copy or imitation, or represents the design of another. Section 1 of the Act of 1862 gives to the author of an original painting, drawing, and photograph, and his assigns, the sole exclusive right of “copying, engraving, reproducing, and multiplying such painting or drawing, the design thereof, or such photograph, and the negative thereof, by any means and of any size,” for the term of his natural life, and for seven years after his death. For the protection of the right thus conferred, s. 6 enacts penalties against any person who, not being the proprietor for the time being “of copyright in any painting, drawing, or photograph,” shall, without the consent of such proprietor, repeat, copy, colourably imitate, or otherwise multiply “any such work, or the design thereof.” It will be noticed that the language of the statute expressly forbids not only copies and colourable imitations of the copyright works, but all reproductions of the design of such work. I do not doubt that the addition of the words relating to design was intended by the legislature to reach invasions of copyright which might possibly escape the imputation of being copies, or colourable imitations of the work itself, and yet appropriated and incorporated the substance of what is described as the design of the work.

H The possibility of laying down any canon which will afford in every case a useful test of what constitutes a copy or colourable imitation of the work or its design, is, in my opinion, very doubtful. At all events, it is much easier to arrive at what does not, than to define what does, constitute a proper test. Thus it is clear that the statute does not exempt copies or imitations which do not reproduce the artistic qualities of the original. A slavish copy of a picture or drawing may be utterly wanting in the artistic merit exhibited by the original; and a copy by an eminent hand may display merits which the original does not possess. But the one is as much prohibited as the other. The language of BAYLEY, J., in West v. Francis (1) comes nearer to a definition of what constitutes copying than anything which is to be found in the books. It runs thus (5 B. & Ald. at p. 743):

I “A copy is that which comes so near to the original as to give to every person seeing it the idea created by the original.”

He was construing for the purposes of the case before him the Prints Copyright Act, 1777, which differs in expression from the Act of 1862, and contains no reference to reproducing the design of the protected work. As I read the Act of 1862, the idea created by a picture or drawing does not necessarily form an element in the original work or its design, which is protected by copyright. The same idea which is suggested by the copyright work may be expressed by another painting or drawing, which is in no sense a copy, and does not borrow its design. To take by way of illustration the appellant's picture of "First Love," or his photograph of it, upon which reliance was chiefly placed, as showing, when compared with the respondent's sketch, an invasion of copyright. The idea conveyed by his copyright picture and photograph is simply love-making (why it should be called "First Love" is not very apparent), and the medium selected for its conveyance is a representation of two figures, male and female, standing in close proximity to each other, and to a rustic stile. It can hardly be seriously maintained that no other artist is at liberty, without the appellant's leave, to suggest the same sentimental idea by grouping together in the neighbourhood of a stile two individuals of opposite sexes, having no resemblance either in personality, dress, or attributes to the loving pair, who are the chief feature of the appellant's photograph.

In all cases where the alleged invasion is not a mere copy, the statute makes it imperative to consider how far there is an identity of design. But the design which the legislature had in contemplation is, to my mind, a very different thing from the idea created by the copyright work. So far as I can judge, the expression "design," as it is used in the statute, means nothing more than the particular forms and arrangements, whether of lines or colouring, which the copyright author has selected as the vehicle for conveying his idea to those who see his work. There may very well be—I can see no reason to doubt that there are—cases in which his design, and the idea to which it gives birth, are both of them so novel and exceptional that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for another author to create the same idea without trenching upon his design. When that occurs, the definition of BAYLEY, J., might come very near the mark. But in cases where copyright is claimed for pictures or drawings which treat an old and common subject, such as love-making beside a stile, the privilege of the author must, in my opinion, be strictly confined to the particular design which he has chosen.

I refrain from applying these observations to the facts of the present case, because I accept without reservation the comments which have already been made by the Lord Chancellor. The respondents relied to some extent in their argument upon the fact that their sketches were not taken from the appellant's copyright works, but from scenes represented by living actors; and that they were merely intended to inform the public of what might be seen at the Empire Theatre. I agree with LINDLEY, L.J., that the circumstance is one of the facts of the case which ought to be taken into consideration. It is clear evidence that the respondents had not the animus furandi. At the same time I am of opinion that it would not be available as a defence to the present action if it were shown that their sketches, intended to represent living pictures, were de facto either copies of the appellant's copyright works, or embodiments of their design. Having, however, come to the conclusion that these sketches are not copies, and do not reproduce the design of the works in question, I concur in the judgment which has been proposed.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I concur. The question is largely one of fact. Are the sketches in the "Daily Graphic" such copies of the pictures of the appellant, or such reproductions of their designs, as are prohibited by the statute? I arrive clearly at the conclusion that they are not. We have had the advantage of seeing excellent photographs of the pictures, and also copies of the "Daily Graphic" with the sketches complained of, and with every opportunity, assisted by the able arguments of the appellant's counsel, of making comparison, I cannot regard

- A the sketches as copies or reproductions of the designs. The subjects dealt with in the pictures are not special or exceptional. They deal with ideas as old as the world, and it would be impossible, as pointed out by the Lord Chancellor, to hold that the appellant could claim anything like a monopoly in every treatment of such common subjects. The idea of the representation at the Empire, as pointed out in the Court of Appeal, was no doubt suggested by the appellant's pictures, and
- B the representation was made as exact as could be with such materials as were procurable. But ideas of such subjects are different from copies and designs, and the Lord Chancellor has pointed out many differences between the sketches and the pictures. Although an innocent intention would afford no defence if the protection given by the statute was clearly infringed, yet it is well to bear in mind that the sketches were intended to represent what could be seen at the Empire
- C Theatre, and were not intended as copies or to reproduce the designs of the appellant's pictures. As a fact, I arrive at the conclusion that they are not such copies or reproductions.

- LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. If the object of the Act of 1862 be, as I suppose it is, to protect the reputation of the artist, and to preserve
- D intact the commercial value of the artist's work, it appears to me that the sketches in the "Daily Graphic" which are complained of are not within the mischief which the Act was designed to repress. They cannot, I think, by any possibility have any injurious effect on the artist's reputation, nor can they, I think, under any conceivable circumstances detract in the slightest degree from the commercial value of the artist's work or come into competition with it, or any
- E reproduction of it. It is quite enough, as it seems to me, to place the sketches in question alongside of any photograph of the pictures of which they are alleged to be piratical copies. In these circumstances, in a case in which there has been no copying and no unfair use of anything which the artist can claim as his, I think it would be straining the Act unduly, and using it to no good purpose, if your Lordships were to hold the plaintiff as against the respondents entitled
- F to any relief under the provisions of the Act.

- LORD SHAND. I agree in thinking that the present appeal ought to be dismissed for the reasons which have been stated by your Lordships. It seems to me to be clear that a painting, drawing, or engraving may be a copy or reproduction of the work of another, though it has not been made directly from that
- G work itself, but by the use of intermediate copies or other indirect means, such as the living pictures which were exhibited in the present instance, and were intended to give a close representation of the paintings, the copyright in which is assumed to belong to the appellant. Whether the particular painting or drawing complained of is a copy or reproduction of another picture "or the design thereof" is a question of fact, and it is not easy, if indeed possible, to formulate
- H the considerations which must be taken into view in all cases in answering the question. The inquiry involves a comparison between two works. The idea of the original, the subject and treatment of it in all its details, the grouping and dress of the figures, in some cases the expression, as intended to convey feelings it may be of resignation, horror, pity, revenge, or the like, the background, and the accessories generally must be taken into account in the comparison to be
- I made. In some cases, the peculiar and distinguishing feature of the work, the copyright of which is said to have been infringed, may be in the special nature of the subject, and its mode of treatment, apart from minor accessories of detail, which may be of a very subordinate character. All that can, I think, be said is, that the question of infringement of the right depends on the degree of resemblance, and must be solved by taking each of the works to be compared as a whole and determining whether there is not merely a similarity or resemblance in some leading feature or in certain of the details, but whether, keeping in view the idea and general effect created by the original, there is such a degree of similarity as would lead one to say that the alleged infringement is a copy or reproduction of the original or the design, having adopted its essential features and substance. I concur in thinking that there are such essential differences between the sketches or illustrations complained of and the paintings belonging to the appellant, that the former cannot be regarded as copies or reproductions of the paintings or of their design. An undischarged bankrupt, without the knowledge or consent of the trustee or creditors, carried on business, acquired property, and incurred liabilities. He executed an assignment of all his property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors, and was again adjudicated a bankrupt upon that act of bankruptcy. An application was made to the court to determine how the debtor's assets at the time of the second adjudication were to be determined. E

Held: the trustee in the first bankruptcy was entitled to all the property acquired by the bankrupt since the first bankruptcy, without any obligation to satisfy any of the liabilities incurred by the bankrupt since the first bankruptcy. F

F Appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and WRIGHT, JJ.), sitting in bankruptcy, reversing a decision of the judge of Hanley County Court.

The debtor, Clark, was adjudicated bankrupt in May, 1884. A trustee was appointed, who was released in 1887, when the official receiver became trustee. No dividend was paid in the bankruptcy and the bankrupt did not obtain his discharge. After 1884 the debtor, without the knowledge or consent of the trustee in bankruptcy or of the creditors, carried on business as a building contractor, and acquired considerable property. In May, 1893, he executed a deed of assignment of all his property for the benefit of his creditors. A bankruptcy petition was presented against him founded on the act of bankruptcy committed by the execution of that deed of assignment, and in June, 1893, a receiving order was made against him, and he was adjudicated bankrupt. The official receiver became the trustee in that bankruptcy. The official receiver applied to the judge of Hanley County Court for directions as to the way in which a sum of over £500, representing the debtor's assets at the time of the second adjudication, was to be administered. The judge directed the official receiver to apply the money first towards discharging the debtor's liabilities in the first bankruptcy and then to apply any surplus in discharging the debtor's liabilities in the second bankruptcy.

G A creditor in the second bankruptcy appealed against that decision, and the Divisional Court sitting in Bankruptcy (VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and WRIGHT, JJ.), reversed the decision of the county court judge. Beardmore, a creditor in the first bankruptcy, appealed.

H

Muir Mackenzie and Ringwood for Beardmore.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the debtor was adjudicated a bankrupt in 1884, and the official receiver subsequently became the trustee in bankruptcy. Certain creditors in that bankruptcy now claim to have certain property dealt with as assets in that bankruptcy. On the other side it is said that, after the adjudication of bankruptcy, and while the official receiver was the trustee, the bankrupt carried on a business and incurred debts and had creditors in that business, and that he then assigned all his property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors. That assignment was an act of bankruptcy, and thereupon there was a bankruptcy petition and an adjudication, and the debtor was adjudicated a bankrupt for the second time, and the official receiver became the trustee in the second bankruptcy also. Then a dispute arose as to the bankruptcy in which the official receiver was to administer the property acquired by the debtor while he was an undischarged bankrupt. The Divisional Court held that the trustee in the second bankruptcy ought to have the administration of that property, but declined to determine the rights of the creditors in the first bankruptcy.

The question is, what are the rights of the trustee in the first bankruptcy, which has not come to an end because the debtor is an undischarged bankrupt. The rights of the trustee in bankruptcy are determined by the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 44 of which provides that

“the property of the bankrupt divisible among his creditors, and in this Act referred to as the property of the bankrupt, shall comprise . . . all such property as may belong to or be vested in the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, or may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge.”

That is the property which is divisible by the trustee in bankruptcy. At the commencement of the bankruptcy there may be property for which the debtor has not paid. If there is, the trustee takes that property because it belongs to the bankrupt, but he does not take it with the obligation to pay for it. Those who supplied that property, but were not paid for it, have to prove in the bankruptcy and take a dividend only. How does a bankrupt acquire property after the commencement of his bankruptcy? He acquires it largely by buying it, and upon credit. If the rights of the trustee of the first kind of property are as I have stated, it is difficult to say that he is not to take the after-acquired property in the same way without the obligation of paying for it. If, therefore, the Act stood alone I should say that such property could not be dealt with in any other way. The view of the Court of Appeal expressed in Ex parte Ford (1) is the same, and is based upon the true construction of the Act. After that case came Cohen v. Mitchell (2), which was not a case between two trustees in two bankruptcies, or between the bankrupt and the trustee, but between the trustee in bankruptcy and a person who had dealt with the bankrupt after his bankruptcy. The court in that case, being actuated by a desire to protect such persons, said that in the particular circumstances the case was not governed by the strict interpretation of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, but was taken out of the operation of s. 44. Under those circumstances it was laid down that,

“until the trustee intervenes, all transactions by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy with any person dealing with him bona fide and for value, in respect of his after-acquired property, whether with or without knowledge of the bankruptcy, are valid against the trustee.”

That was going a long way.

Is this case within that rule? I cannot see how it can be, and for these reasons. The person here did not deal with the bankrupt for value within the meaning of that proposition, and this case, therefore, is governed by s. 44, and is not within the exception established by Cohen v. Mitchell (2). It is impossible to suppose that the judges who decided Cohen v. Mitchell (2) intended to overrule Ex parte Ford (1) which was cited to them, and they, therefore, must have thought that Cohen v. Mitchell (2) was a different case from Ex parte Ford (1). There are then

- A two classes of cases : one the ordinary case, as in Ex parte Ford (1); and the other the exceptional cases, as in Cohen v. Mitchell (2). There is also another exceptional case, where the bankrupt trades with the knowledge and consent of the trustee. That is not this case. This case, therefore, is within the ordinary operation of s. 44, according to the decision in Ex parte Ford (1), and is not an exception within any rule which has yet been established. It has been suggested that a bankrupt
- B when he trades is trading as the agent of the trustee, and that the trustee must, if he takes to the property, take it with all its burdens and obligations. For myself I cannot see how, according to the law of principal and agent, the bankrupt can be the agent of the trustee. If that proposition is true, then Ex parte Ford (1) was wrongly decided. I am of opinion, therefore, that this case must be decided in the same way as Ex parte Ford (1), and that we must reverse the decision of the
- C Divisional Court and allow this appeal.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In this case Clark was adjudicated a bankrupt in 1884, and the official receiver ultimately became the trustee in that bankruptcy. Then Clark, without the knowledge or permission of the trustee or creditors, traded, and in 1893 was adjudicated a bankrupt for the second time, the act of bankruptcy being an assignment of all his property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors generally.

- D The question which now comes before us for decision is whether the property amounting to over £500, which Clark acquired while so trading, is to be administered in the second bankruptcy or in the first bankruptcy. The judges in the Divisional Court held that it must be administered in the second bankruptcy, and
- E we have to say whether that decision was correct. By s. 54 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which governs this case, it is enacted that “until a trustee is appointed the official receiver shall be the trustee for the purposes of this Act, and immediately upon a debtor, being adjudged bankrupt the property of the bankrupt shall vest in the trustee;”

- F and, by s. 44, that

“the property of the bankrupt divisible among his creditors, and in this Act referred to as the property of the bankrupt, . . . shall comprise . . . all such property as may belong to or be vested in the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, or may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge.”

- G Therefore, as has been pointed out by the Master of the Rolls, it appears from the Act, that all property belonging to the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, and also all property acquired by him after the bankruptcy and before discharge, will be property belonging to the trustee in the first bankruptcy, and not to the trustee in the second bankruptcy.

- H An exception has been grafted upon these sections, and a distinction drawn as to property belonging to the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy and property afterwards acquired by him. This was laid down in cases which held that, as to after-acquired property, until the trustee intervenes the bankrupt can deal with persons who deal with him bona fide and for valuable consideration. In Cohen v. Mitchell (2) it was held that, where an undischarged bankrupt enters into transactions in respect of property acquired by him after the bankruptcy, until the trustee intervenes all such transactions with any person dealing with the bankrupt bona fide and for value, whether with or without knowledge of the bankruptcy, are valid against the trustee. That was a case between the trustee and a person who had so dealt with the bankrupt. This dispute is between the trustee in the first bankruptcy and the trustee in the second bankruptcy, and Ex parte Ford (1) has been cited as an authority in point.
- I

That case was not prominently brought to the attention of the court below, and I think that that fact accounts for their decision being what it was. I cannot distinguish this case from Ex parte Ford (1), which, decided by the Court of Appeal, seems to me to be on all-fours with this case. There a person, who was in effect an undischarged bankrupt, traded without the knowledge or consent of the trustee or creditors, and thereby acquired some property, and was then in effect made bankrupt a second time, and the question was, whether the trustee in the first bankruptcy or the trustee in the second bankruptcy was entitled to that property. That is the question in this case. I think, therefore, that Ex parte Ford (1) is conclusive upon this point, that, if the trustee in the first bankruptcy has not permitted and known of the trading by the bankrupt, he is entitled to the after-acquired property. Ex parte Ford (1) was subsequently dealt with in Meggy v. Imperial Discount Co., Ltd. (3), where COTTON, L.J., affirms the doctrine laid down in that case, and says:

"The doctrine, that knowledge of the dealing by the insolvent with the property left in his charge is essential to deprive the trustee of it, is adopted by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Ex parte Ford (1)."

There are then two cases in the Court of Appeal which establish that doctrine. In my opinion, this case is not distinguishable from, and is governed by, Ex parte Ford (1). The Divisional Court had not its attention properly called to Ex parte Ford (1), and decided this case upon the principle laid down in Cohen v. Mitchell (2), which I have already stated, and held that the trustee in the second bankruptcy was a person who had dealt with the bankrupt bona fide and for valuable consideration. In Cohen v. Mitchell (2) the court was not deciding the rights of the trustee in the first bankruptcy and the trustee in the second bankruptcy, but the rights of a third person who had dealt with the bankrupt before the trustee intervened. It is then argued that, as held by WRIGHT, J., because this property was assigned to a trustee for the benefit of creditors, that assignment was within the rule laid down in Cohen v. Mitchell (2). I think that there is nothing in that argument.

Then a third point was raised, that, if it is held that this property belongs to the trustee in the first bankruptcy, the result will be that, the subsequent creditors having really provided this property, their money will go to the creditors in the first bankruptcy and they will get nothing at all. It is urged that the trustee in the first bankruptcy, if he takes such after-acquired property of the bankrupt, must first pay the debts of the business. The Master of the Rolls has pointed out that such a contention is not in accordance with the rules of bankruptcy. All property belonging to the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy vests absolutely in the trustee without any such liability to pay debts in respect of the property, and creditors must prove for their debts. The same rule must apply to property afterwards acquired by the bankrupt. I agree that this appeal must be allowed.

DAVEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that this case is governed by authority, and I would add nothing if I were not differing from the judgment of the Divisional Court. We must first look at the words of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, itself. Section 44 says that and s. 54 vests that property in the trustee in bankruptcy for the time being. Therefore, all property acquired by, or devolving upon, the bankrupt before his discharge vests in the trustee and is divisible amongst the creditors who are entitled to prove in the bankruptcy. Upon the literal words of the statute there can be no doubt, but we have been referred to cases in which the question has been considered how far a bankrupt dealing with a third person bona fide and for value can enable such third person to maintain his title against the trustee in bankruptcy. That was the only question in those cases,

"the property of the bankrupt divisible among his creditors, and in this Act referred to as the property of the bankrupt . . . shall comprise . . . all such property as may belong to or be vested in the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, or may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge;"

A In Morgan v. Knight (4) ERLE, C.J., says (15 C.B.N.S. at p. 677):

"The result of the cases is, not only that he may acquire property, but that he may hold it against all the world, except his assignees, and may create rights to hold it against them, if they, expressly or impliedly, consent to such property being in his order and disposition at the time of a subsequent bankruptcy."

B In Cohen v. Mitchell (2) the rule is thus stated (25 Q.B.D. 262):

"Until the trustee intervenes, all transactions by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy with any person dealing with him bona fide and for value in respect of his after-acquired property, whether with or without knowledge of the bankruptcy, are valid against the trustee."

C That lays down a beneficial and just rule with respect to the rights of third persons who have dealt with a bankrupt bona fide and for value. Nothing in those cases, however, affects the question as to the rights of the trustee in the first bankruptcy, in the circumstances of a case like the present, as against the trustee in the second bankruptcy.

D In my opinion, the question in the present case is conclusively settled by the decision in Ex parte Ford (1), and I agree that the present case is not distinguishable from that case. I do not think that Ex parte Ford (1) is in any way impeached by the decision in Cohen v. Mitchell (2), and the former decision was confirmed in

E Meggy v. Imperial Discount Co., Ltd. (3). In the court below, VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., decided this case upon the authority of Cohen v. Mitchell (2), and thought that the rule laid down in that case was to be extended to the case of the trustee in the second bankruptcy. I think that he cannot have adequately considered Ex parte Ford (1). I entirely dissent from the proposition that the trustee in the second bankruptcy is on the same footing as a bona fide assignee for value.

F A general assurance of property is very different from an assignment of particular property, and I doubt whether a general assurance of property can come within the rule laid down in Cohen v. Mitchell (2). The broad and general principle is, that the trustee in bankruptcy takes all property of the bankrupt with the same title as the bankrupt, unless he takes it by virtue of special provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. In the Divisional Court WRIGHT, J., took another point. He said that there had been an assignment by Clark for the benefit of his creditors, and that placed the trustee in the first bankruptcy in a dilemma. I think that the short answer to that is, that Cohen v. Mitchell (2) only decides that a person dealing with the bankrupt bona fide and for value has a good title against the trustee in bankruptcy, and that rule is established only in favour of persons who have so dealt. In this case the trustee in the second bankruptcy is not claiming under the assignment, and therefore the question does not arise.

G As to the last point which has been urged, that, if this property is taken away from the creditors in the second bankruptcy, it will be taking away property which has been created by means of the liabilities incurred to such creditors during the carrying on of the business, it has been pointed out that TINDAL, C.J., in Herbert v. Sayer (5) (5 Q.B.D. at p. 981) expresses the opinion that an undischarged bankrupt acquires property or contracts for the benefit of his trustee "in the nature of an agent;" and it is argued that the trustee is, therefore, bound to satisfy the liabilities incurred by the agent in such case. That might be reasonable and just, but the answer is, that the words of the statute make this property vest in the trustee in the first bankruptcy, and that the statute contains no words showing any intention either to bind or to permit the trustee to divert such property from the payment of all the debts of the bankrupt. That argument also cannot prevail against the decision in Ex parte Ford (1). I agree, therefore, that this appeal must succeed.

Inderwick, Q.C., and Searle for the petitioner wife.

- G July 16, 1894. The following judgments were read.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of the President of the Divorce Court discharging the respondent from further maintaining one of his children, who has recently attained sixteen.

- On Mar. 15, 1892, the petitioner, Mrs. Thomasset, obtained a decree for divorce from the respondent. On Aug. 8, 1893, an order was made for the payment by the respondent to the petitioner of permanent alimony at the rate of £266 per annum, and £23 6s. 8d. per annum for each of the four younger children of the marriage for their maintenance and education. On Mar. 27, 1894, the eldest of these four children, Theodore, attained sixteen, and on June 1, 1894, an order was made by the registrar, on the application of the respondent, that the
- I allowance of £23 6s. 8d. for the maintenance of such child should cease. This order was affirmed by the President, not because he was of opinion that under the circumstances of the case it was just or expedient to vary the former order of Aug. 8, 1893, but simply because as a matter of law that order ought to be discharged as regards the child who had attained sixteen. The object of this appeal is to have the view of the law reconsidered.

The question thus raised is one of very considerable importance, and renders it necessary to consider the jurisdiction and practice of the Divorce Court as regards the custody, maintenance, and education of children. Before, however, referring to the statutes which relate to this matter it is desirable to state, shortly, the law and practice of the courts of common law and Chancery and of the ecclesiastical courts as regards infants. In former times the ecclesiastical courts appointed guardians for infants in testamentary causes and cases of intestacy (see BURNS'S ECCLESIASTICAL LAW (9th Edn.), vol. 4, p. 142), but it is so long since these courts have interfered between parent and child that it is needless to refer further to them. The jurisdiction of courts of law was exercised by habeas corpus. The principles on which courts of common law act in dealing with persons brought up under a habeas corpus are very clearly stated in the judgment of COLERIDGE, J., in R. v. Greenhill (2) (4 Ad. & El. at p. 643). [His LORDSHIP read an extract from that judgment, and continued:] The age at which a child is deemed to have a discretion is fourteen in the case of a boy and sixteen in the case of a girl: see R. v. Clarke (3). The age of sixteen appears to have been adopted by reason of the language used in the statute 4 & 5 Phil. & M., c. 8 [1557], s. 3, relating to the abduction of girls [repealed by Offences Against the Person Act, 1828]: see R. v. Howes (4). After a child has attained the age of discretion a court of common law will set it free if illegally detained, but will not force a child against his or her will to remain with his or her father or legal guardian, although LORD MANSFIELD said that the court had a discretion as to the order it would make: see R. v. Delaval (5); and see the note to Ex parte Hopkins (6), 3 P.Wms. at p. 153.

It must not, however, be inferred from the decisions referred to above that a father has no legal right to the custody of his child after he or she has attained the age of fourteen or sixteen. The father's right to such custody exists until the child attains twenty-one. This is clearly stated in HARGRAVES'S note to COKE UPON LITTLETON, p. 88 b. This right of the father was extended by the Tenures Abolition Act, 1660, s. 8, which enabled him by deed or will to appoint a guardian for any of his children until they attain twenty-one. The right of the father himself as guardian of his children to their custody until they attain twenty-one is taken for granted, although not expressly declared in this statute. Such right, moreover, was distinctly recognised by PATTESON, J., in an opinion given by him when a judge to SIR ERSKINE PERRY: see R. v. Clarke (3), 7 E. & B. at p. 199; and was again recognised by COCKBURN, C.J., in R. v. Howes (4). Lastly, this right was recently emphatically asserted by the Court of Appeal in Re Agar-Ellis (7), where an attempt was made to remove a girl over sixteen from the care of her father.

The jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery over infants is twofold. In so far as it depends on the law relating to writs of habeas corpus, the power of the court appears to have been the same as that of courts of common law. But quite independently of those writs the Court of Chancery exercised the power of the Crown as parens patriæ over infants, and in the exercise of this jurisdiction the power of the court has always been much more extensive than that possessed by courts of common law under a writ of habeas corpus: see Re Spence (8), 2 Ph. at p. 252; per COTTON, L.J., in Re Agar-Ellis (7) (24 Ch.D. at p. 330); and R. v. Gyngall (9). The Court of Chancery has exercised this larger power in aid of fathers and guardians over children who have attained the age of discretion. Thus, in Hall v. Hall (10) and in Anon. (11), boys over sixteen have been compelled to go to the schools selected by their guardians, and in Todd v. Lynes (12), referred to in SIMPSON ON INFANTS (2nd Edn.), p. 144, a boy of seventeen was taken from a monastery and given up to the father. What the wishes of the boy were does not, however, appear. In the exercise of this jurisdiction the rights of fathers and legal guardians were always respected, but were controlled to an extent unknown at common law by considering the real welfare of the infants: see Re McGrath (Infants) (13), and the cases there referred to.

As regards maintenance the parent's obligations were measured both at law and in equity by the poor laws. I know of no case in which a father has been ordered by a court of equity to maintain his child. Courts of equity ordered

A children to be maintained out of their own property. But the jurisdiction as to maintenance and education was limited to such property. By the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, each division of the High Court can exercise the jurisdiction of the old Court of Chancery, and by s. 25 (10), it is enacted that “in questions relating to the custody and education of infants the rules of equity shall prevail.”

B This enactment enables all divisions of the High Court, even on habeas corpus, to regard something more than strict legal rights of fathers and guardians and requires all the divisions to recognise the cardinal principle on which the Court of Chancery always proceeded, viz., that in dealing with infants the primary consideration is their benefit. This view of the enactment was distinctly adopted and acted upon by the Court of Appeal in R. v. Gynngall (9), in which LORD ESHER, M.R., explained some previous observations made by him in Re Agar-Ellis (7), and which observations had apparently been somewhat misunderstood.

C Having made these preliminary observations, I proceed to consider the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court as regards the custody and maintenance of the children of persons divorced or judicially separated. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 35, runs thus:

“... on any petition for dissolving a marriage, the court may from time to time, before making its final decree, make such interim orders, and may make such provision in the final decree as it may deem just and proper with respect to the custody, maintenance, and education of the children, the marriage of whose parents is the subject of such suit . . .”

E This power was extended to applications made after decree by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, s. 4. [HIS LORDSHIP read the section, and continued:] The jurisdiction thus conferred is far greater than that exercised by any court previously existing. This was early seen, and is explicitly stated in Marsh v. Marsh (14) and Spratt v. Spratt (15). Nothing can be wider than the discretion and power conferred upon the Divorce Court by those two sections. It can order parents to maintain and educate their children at their own expense, which no court could do before. And if it were not for the decisions to which I am about to refer, I should have thought that the power to order payment of a proper sum for the maintenance and education of the children under twenty-one of persons who had been divorced or judicially separated too clear for reasonable doubt. I can discover no ground

G for saying that infants between the ages of fourteen or sixteen and twenty-one are not children within the meaning of the above enactments. The necessity for providing children with maintenance and education does not stop at fourteen or sixteen, and neither the necessities of the case nor the language of the statutes require or, in my opinion, admit of a construction which limits the power of the court to provide for children under fourteen or sixteen.

H However, there are decisions to the effect that the power of the court is so limited, and the President has considered himself bound by those decisions. It is necessary to examine them. There are five in all, viz., three before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and two since. Those before the Act are—(1861) Ryder v. Ryder (16), custody; (1862) Webster v. Webster (17), maintenance; (1866) Mallinson v. Mallinson (18), custody. Ryder v. Ryder (16) was a decision

I of the full court, consisting of SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL, WILLES, J., and CHANNELL, B.; and it was there decided that the court had no jurisdiction to make any order as to the custody of children over sixteen. The main ground for this decision appears to have been that courts of common law did not make orders disposing of the custody of children over sixteen, and the Divorce Court had not the children before it, and could not, therefore, enforce against them any order it might make. This reasoning does not appear to me satisfactory. The Divorce Court could decide as between the parents which parent should have the custody of the children. And even if the Divorce Court could not bring the children before it and exercise jurisdiction over them, still, if the Divorce Court had made an order binding on the parents, such an order might, if necessary and proper, have been enforced by proceedings in Chancery. A

The effect of Ryder v. Ryder (16) practically was to enable a delinquent father to set up the age of his infant child as an answer to an application for an order for its custody. This was, in my opinion, an unfortunate decision; but it is one from which the Judicature Acts have, in my opinion, set us free. It was also wrong to hold as a matter of law that maintenance followed custody, and that the court had no jurisdiction to order maintenance for a child over sixteen. This was decided in Webster v. Webster (17), although WILLES, J., in Ryder v. Ryder (16) had pointed out that it did not follow from that decision that maintenance could not be ordered for a child over sixteen. B

Even before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, the cases, in my judgment, went too far. But after that Act I confess my inability to understand how it can be right to hold that the statutory discretion conferred upon the court is restricted within the narrow limits previously supposed. And in Benyon v. Benyon and O'Callaghan (19) an allowance was made for a child until twenty-one. However, in Blandford v. Blandford (1) SIR CHARLES BUTT, P., distinctly held that the court had no power to make an order as to the custody, or maintenance, or education of a child who was over sixteen years of age. The attention of the President does not, however, appear to have been called either to the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, or to Re Agar-Ellis (7), and his decision, in my judgment, was erroneous. In the present case the President has simply followed Blandford v. Blandford (1), which he considered to be binding on him. C D

In my judgment the wide discretion conferred on the Divorce Court by the Divorce Acts has been unduly restricted by judicial decision. Such discretion ought to be exercised in each particular case as the circumstances of that case may require. And in exercising such discretion the Divorce Court, which has now all the powers of the old Court of Chancery, is not and ought not to consider itself fettered by any supposed rule to the effect that it has no power to make orders under the Acts respecting the custody, maintenance, or education of infants who, being males, are over fourteen, or who, being females, are over sixteen. I am clearly of opinion that, whether the children are males or females, the jurisdiction conferred by the sections of the Divorce Acts on which this case turns can, since the Judicature Acts at all events, be exercised during the whole period of infancy—that is, until the children, whether males or females, attain twenty-one, although I do not, however, say that a child who has attained years of discretion can, except under very special circumstances, be properly ordered into the custody of either parent against such child's own wishes. The appeal must therefore be allowed, and the case must be remitted to be dealt with on its merits, freed from the fetter by which the discretion of the judge was previously considered to be restricted. The costs of the appeal must be borne by the respondent. E F G H

LOPES, L.J.—This is a very important case, and as we are expressing a view different from that previously entertained, I desire to give my reasons for the conclusion at which we have arrived.

The jurisdiction of the Divorce Court with regard to the custody, maintenance, and education of the children of parents divorced or judicially separated is derived from s. 35 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, extended to applications made after decree by s. 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859. It is this section which the court is now called upon to construe. If I was construing this section for the first time apart from authority, I should have no hesitation in holding that a wide and comprehensive power was conferred on the Divorce Court, enabling the court in the case of parents who by their misconduct had subjected themselves to its jurisdiction to order them to educate and maintain at their own cost the I

A children of the marriage so long as they should be under the age of twenty-one; a power, however, to be exercised at the discretion of the court according to the particular circumstances of each case in which its interference is invoked. It is difficult to see on what ground infants under the age of twenty-one are not to be regarded as children within the meaning of s. 35. Nor can I understand on what ground the obligation to maintain and educate them is to determine at the

B ages of fourteen in the case of males and sixteen in the case of females, even if the right to their custody was to terminate at those periods. There is nothing in s. 35 warranting such a conclusion, and, having regard to the words of the section, I should be slow to adopt such a construction of the section unless compelled so to do. Education and maintenance are as necessary between the

C ages of fourteen or sixteen and twenty-one as before those periods. To leave a child at the age of fourteen or sixteen without any provision for its maintenance and education in the case of parents divorced or judicially separated would be inhuman, and could never have been intended by the legislature. Apart from authority, I do not understand that the President would so have interpreted the section in question. I rather gather that his view was in favour of the construction which I place upon the section, but he considered himself bound, as

D he was, by previous decisions of his court.

I proceed to consider those decisions and the grounds upon which they were based. Ryder v. Ryder (16) was decided in 1861 by the full court, consisting of SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL, WILLES, J., and CHANNELL, B., and it was held that the court under s. 35 of the Act of 1857 has no jurisdiction to make any order as to the custody of children upwards of sixteen years of age; but WILLES, J.,

E said at the conclusion of his judgment:

"The question as to any order in respect of the maintenance of children above sixteen, if necessary, is not affected by our present decision."

And this dictum is more fully given in the report of the same case in 30 L.J.P.M. & A. at p. 47, where the judge said:

"It is not to be inferred that the court has no power to order the maintenance of children between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one. It may well confer a benefit on parties not before it, but that is a very different thing from its interfering with their liberty, and ordering them to do something which they may not approve."

G Webster v. Webster (17) was decided in 1862 by SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL, and in that case the Judge Ordinary, although the dictum of WILLES, J., in Ryder v. Ryder (16) was brought to his notice, held that the court had no power to order that a provision should be made for the maintenance and education of a child above the age of sixteen, saying "that in his opinion the maintenance followed the custody." I am at a loss to understand on what he based this

H opinion, even if he thought the power with regard to the custody terminated at that age.

Mallinson v. Mallinson (18) came before the court in 1866, and LORD PENZANCE, following R. v. Howes (4), considered that the power of the court to control the custody of children terminated at the age of sixteen. These are all the decisions before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873. Since that Act

I there are two cases to which it is necessary to refer. One is Benyon v. Benyon and O'Callaghan (19) where an order for maintenance was made for a child until twenty-one; the other is Blandford v. Blandford (1), the case upon which, as I understand, the President acted. In that case SIR CHARLES BUTT, P., held that the court had no power to make provision for the maintenance of children above the age of sixteen. He says ([1892] P. at p. 151):

"It is perfectly clear, on principle and authority that, if I were dealing with the first of the matters mentioned in the sections, that is, with custody,

I should have no power to make an order as to the custody of a child who had attained the age of sixteen years. When we come to the next matter—education—the sections can only be intended to apply to the education of young persons, and are certainly not intended to apply to the education of a child as long as he or she may live. Am I to put a different construction on the sections in regard to maintenance? My own opinion is, that the sections dealing with the custody, maintenance, and education of children apply only to infants, and deal with all these matters exactly in the same way.”

Such is the state of the authorities at the present time.

In the Divorce Court, therefore, it has been held that, the right of parents to the custody of their children terminating at sixteen, no provision for education or maintenance can be ordered after that age. As I have said before, even if the right to the custody did terminate at sixteen, I should not be prepared to hold that the power to order a provision for education and maintenance was to be so limited. The Act of Parliament does not, in my opinion, associate custody, education, and maintenance together with a view of subjecting them to the same incidents, but intends the court to deal with each in such a way as it thinks fit. The basis upon which the decisions are founded is the assumption that the right of the parent to the custody of his children terminates at the age of sixteen. But is this correct? No doubt a writ of habeas corpus would not go to compel a child over the age of sixteen to return into the custody of the parent when such child was unwilling to submit to such custody. But, subject to such unwillingness on the part of the child, I can entertain no doubt but that the parent is entitled to the custody of his child as against anybody detaining the child against its will up to the age of twenty-one. There can be, I think, no doubt but that the right of parents to the control and guardianship of their children exists up to the age of twenty-one years, unless the parents have, by their own grossly immoral and improper conduct, forfeited their rights or abdicated their parental authority.

The Tenures Abolition Act, 1660, gives the father the power of appointing a testamentary guardian: s. 8 gives to a father power by will, or by a deed, to dispose of the custody and tuition of his child or children for and during such time as he or they shall respectively remain under the age of twenty-one years or any lesser time. That Act authorises the father to delegate to others the custody and tuition of his children until they are twenty-one. Nothing can be a clearer declaration of the law than that the father himself, when living, has the right to the custody and tuition of his children while they are under the age of twenty-one years. R. v. Howes (4) was a habeas corpus case, but COCKBURN, C.J., says:

“Now, the cases which have been decided on this subject show that, although a father is entitled to the custody of his children until they attain the age of twenty-one, this court will not grant a habeas corpus to hand a child which is below that age over to its father, provided it has attained an age of sufficient discretion to enable it to exercise a wise choice for its own interests.”

The Lord Chief Justice distinctly recognised that during infancy and over sixteen the right of the father still continues. The right of the father to control and direct the education of children until twenty-one was very fully considered in Re Agar-Ellis (7), and it was held that the right continued until the age of twenty-one was attained. I am unable, therefore, to agree with the assumption upon which the cases in respect of maintenance in the Divorce Court have proceeded, viz., the right of the parent to the custody of his children terminating at the age of sixteen.

In my judgment, the Divorce Court has power under the sections in question to make orders for the custody, education, and maintenance of children up to the age of twenty-one—a power to be exercised with discretion, according to

A the particular circumstances of each case in which its interference is invoked. The appeal must be allowed, and the case go back to be dealt with on its merits.

Contract—Discharge—Merger—Merger of simple debt in specialty debt—Contract to purchase realty—Merger in mortgage deed.

Some time before his death, H. sold real property situated in the colony of N. Part of the purchase money was paid in cash, and the purchaser agreed to pay the balance by promissory notes falling due at various dates, the due payment of which was secured by a mortgage. The mortgage deed contained an express covenant to pay the promissory notes when due, and a proviso for the execution of a release by H. on full payment. It also contained a proviso that "no simple contract shall be considered as having merged in the specialty created by or contained in these presents." At the time of his death, H., who was resident and domiciled in the colony of V., had the mortgage deed with him in V. and the promissory notes were at a bank in V. The purchasers were resident in N. In order to determine whether probate duty was payable in N. on this debt, it had to be decided where the debt was situated.

Held: (i) although a debt could have no absolute local existence, it might be treated as possessing an attribute of locality which in the case of a contract debt was the place where the debtor resided, and in the case of a specialty debt was the place where the sealed instrument was found at the creditor's death; and (ii) even if the contract debt had not merged, the debt was still a specialty debt, and, accordingly, it was situated in V. and probate duty was not payable on it in N.

Appeal by the Commissioner of Stamps for New South Wales from an order of the Supreme Court of New South Wales of Mar. 6, 1890, on a Special Case stated for the opinion of the court, by which order the appellant was directed to repay to the respondent the sum of £4,114, erroneously assessed upon and paid by her by way of probate duty, as executrix of the will of George Hope.

At the time of the testator's death he was resident and domiciled in the colony of Victoria, but he died possessed of estate liable to probate duty within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, and it became necessary, therefore, for the respondent to clothe herself with probate from that colony. By the Royal Charter of Justice for New South Wales, the Supreme Court was authorised to grant probates of the last wills and testaments of the inhabitants of the colony, limited, however, to such "money, goods, chattels, and effects as the deceased person shall be entitled to within that part of the said colony within the island of New Holland," and by various Stamp Duty Acts duties were authorised to be charged upon "all estates, whether real or personal, which belonged to any testator." It was also provided that the applicant for probate should lodge an affidavit and inventory setting forth an account of the estate of the deceased, with power to the Commissioner of Stamps for the colony, if dissatisfied with the account so given, to cause a new account and inventory to be made, upon the footing of which he is to assess the duty, subject to a right of appeal, of which the present case was an exercise. Under this Act the respondent accordingly furnished an inventory, in which she admitted assets within the colony to the value of £26,114, but the appellant was dissatisfied with this account, and assessed the duty upon the footing of a new inventory, in which he charged the estate with duty upon the unpaid balance of certain promissory notes to the testator, which had been given to him under the following circumstances.

The testator, in the year 1882, was the owner of a station within the colony of New South Wales called Beemery, which he in that year agreed to sell to Alfred Kirkpatrick and two other persons, the agreement being that the purchasers should pay to the testator the sum of £46,316 13s. 4d., part of the purchase money, in cash, and that the sum of £92,633 6s. 8d., the balance, with interest, should be paid by twelve promissory notes, falling due at various dates, the due payment of which should be secured by mortgage of the station. The cash payment was accordingly made, and the notes set out in the inventory, and dated July 21, 1882—the last of which was payable on July 24, 1886 (after the testator's death)—were handed over, and possession of the station was given, and on Mar. 12, 1883, the

A purchasers executed the agreed mortgage by deed under seal. By this deed the station and effects were assigned to the testator, with the powers and provisions usual in the case of mortgage. The deed also contained a proviso for the execution of a release by the testator if the mortgagors duly retired and paid the promissory notes at maturity, the usual power of entry and sale in case of default, and in particular an express covenant by the mortgagors with the deceased "to retire and pay the said several promissory notes as and when the said several promissory notes respectively shall become due and payable according to the effect and tenor thereof respectively."

This deed, therefore, clearly created a debt by "specialty," in which, under ordinary circumstances and without any expression or implication of a contrary intention, the simple contract debts created by the promissory notes would have been merged. But such was not the intention of the parties, and accordingly the deed contained a proviso of great importance, that "no simple contract shall be considered as having merged in the specialty created by or contained in these presents, and that in any action upon any simple contract the defence that such simple contract was merged in or extinguished in any specialty created by or contained in these presents shall not be available or be used, and that no negotiable security or securities taken for or in respect of any moneys for the time being owing on the security of these presents shall in any way postpone or affect this security, or all or any of the powers or provisions hereof or hereby created."

The latter part of the proviso was intended to meet a provision in the mortgage by which, if default was made in the payment of any of the promissory notes, the whole of the moneys thereby secured should become immediately due and payable, and an analogous provision in the declaration of trusts of the proceeds of any sale made in the event of such default so to appropriate the proceeds. So that in such event the remedy under seal might, at the option of the deceased, at once be brought into operation for the whole remaining balance.

F The testator died on April 25, 1884. Such of the promissory notes as fell due during his lifetime had been duly paid, leaving the balance to become payable as the notes respectively should come to maturity. The testator, as before stated, resided within the colony of Victoria at the time of his death, and had at that time the deed with him in that colony; the debtors were resident in New South Wales; the promissory notes were held by a bank in Victoria.

Finlay, Q.C., and Sutton for the respondents.

H It was stated in the Case, and apparently is the fact, that the respondent was assessed in the colony of Victoria, and paid duty upon this debt; but the appellant insisted upon his right to charge the duty in New South Wales, and the respondent, therefore, paid the amount under protest, and subject to the decision of the Supreme Court upon a Special Case, which was agreed to between the parties, and in which the question was whether the balance of £75,727 15s. was liable to probate duty in New South Wales as assessed. On the argument of the case it was correctly held by the Supreme Court, on the authority of Blackwood v. R. (3), I decided by this Board, that the general words in the statute "personal estate" must be read as limited to such estate as the grant or probate confers jurisdiction to administer, and that the appellant therefore, in order to establish the liability he alleged, must make out that the asset is one existing within the local area of the limited jurisdiction created by the Act.

A debt per se, although a chattel and part of the personal estate which the probate confers authority to administer, has, of course, no absolute local existence; but it has been long established in the courts of this country, and is a well-settled rule governing all questions as to which court can confer the required authority, that a debt does possess an attribute of locality arising from and according to its nature, and the distinction drawn and well settled has been and is whether it is a debt by contract or a debt by specialty. In the former case, the debt being merely a chose in action—money to be recovered from the debtor and nothing more—could have no other local existence than the personal residence of the debtor, where the assets to satisfy it would presumably be, and it was held therefore to be bona notabilia within the area of the local jurisdiction within which he resided; but this residence is of course of a changeable and fleeting nature, and depending upon the movements of the debtor, and inasmuch as a debt under seal or specialty had a species of corporeal existence by which its locality might be reduced to a certainty, and was a debt of a higher nature than one by contract, it was settled in very early days that such a debt was bona notabilia where it was “conspicuous,” i.e., within the jurisdiction within which the specialty was found at the time of death: see WENTWORTH ON THE OFFICE OF EXECUTORS, Edn. 1763, pp. 45, 47, 60.

This rule received an apt illustration in the comparatively modern case of Gurney v. Rawlins (1). In that case executors claimed a right to recover under a diocesan probate, and the subject-matter of their claim was a policy of insurance under seal, by which the capital stock of an insurance company was made chargeable with the amount assured. The defendants disputed the authority of the plaintiffs to recover under that probate, alleging that they were resident in London, and that the capital stock of the company was out of the diocese, so that a prerogative probate was essential, but the replication that the policy was within the diocese at the time of his death was held good, on the ground that the debt was by specialty and so bona notabilia where it was found at the time of death.

The correctness and application of the rule was not disputed at their Lordships' Bar, but it was contended on the part of the appellant that under the circumstances of this case the debt was one by simple contract. It was urged that in substance it was the balance of the purchase money, or at the least that it was due by virtue of the promissory notes, and that it was part of the testator's estate in New South Wales, where the debtors resided at the time of death, and it was urged that the mortgage was under the circumstances of the case merely a collateral security, was never in fact acted upon, and was of no value.

On the other side their Lordships were asked to hold that such was not the case, but that the taking of the mortgage under seal operated by act of law as a merger or satisfaction of the prior simple contract debt, and it was contended that such was the case, notwithstanding the express contract of the parties to the contrary.

This contention was founded upon the authority of Price v. Moulton (2) which was decided by judges of very great authority. That case, however, was decided upon special demurrer, and the pleadings, as observed by the court, are far from clear. The pleading in answer to the indebitatus count certainly admitted that a subsequent contract under seal, identical with the parol contract pleaded to, had been entered into between the parties, and thus a good technical answer to the claim under the indebitatus count was undoubtedly set up. But the plaintiff sought to get rid of this technicality, not by setting out the deed which would have shown its nature and specific terms, and whether it did or did not operate as a merger, but by an averment that it was made by way of security and so expressed; and it seems to their Lordships that the court may well have considered that this mode of pleading did not deny that the terms of the deed in themselves effected the merger, but only asserted the intention of the parties that it was to be by way of collateral security only.

The reported language of the court in some places indeed seems to imply a larger and broader meaning; but if that is to be understood as importing that a merger of a simple contract debt in a debt of a higher nature is effected by law, merely by the existence of an identical covenant, and notwithstanding the plain intention of the parties to the contrary, that is a proposition to which their

A Lordships would hesitate to assent. It would appear to be contrary to other decided cases (Twopenny v. Young (4)), and the authorities collected and classified in 2 FISHER ON MORTGAGES (3rd Edn.), ss. 1328 to 1334. Indeed, in the subsequent case of Boaler v. Mayor (5), in the same court, one of the learned judges, who had been a party to and concurred in the judgment in Price v. Moulton (2), seems to have implied that the court in Price v. Moulton (2) had no intention

B of laying down any such general rule, and to have done so with the assent of the very learned counsel who had argued the case in the contrary sense. But it does not seem to their Lordships to be necessary, for the decision of the case now before them, to come to any definite conclusion as to the effect which ought to be given to Price v. Moulton (2).

If merger is an implication of law, so strong that it takes effect even against

C intention, then the simple contract in the present case was undoubtedly merged and extinguished, and the debt was no other than a debt by specialty. But, upon the contrary supposition, that the effect of the proviso was to preserve the remedies by simple contract to the extent stipulated for, it appears to their Lordships that the debt was still a specialty debt. The deed contains an express covenant to retire and pay the promissory notes; between the same parties it was an existing security

D under seal, at the time of the testator's death, for the balance then due; it would continue to be a security for a much longer period, and would be attended with advantages not belonging to debt by simple contract. Although it never became necessary to act upon the deed by taking possession or seeking any remedy under it, it was and remained a registered deed under the system of colonial registration, and of full force and validity. There is but one debt, whether in Victoria or

E New South Wales, and their Lordships fail to see how it can be said that that debt has not become a debt by specialty.

This is the conclusion at which the Supreme Court has arrived, and their Lordships think it is correct, and they will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that the order below should be affirmed. The appellant must bear the costs of this appeal.

Will—Gift to donees for lives and lives of heirs—Strict construction—Intestacy on death of heirs.

Trade Union—Property—Right to hold—"Purchase"—Gift under will—Trade Union Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict., c. 31), s. 7.

By his will a testator gave a leasehold house to T.P. "for his life and for the life of his heir, after which it becomes the property of" a trade union registered under the Trade Union Act, 1871. The testator also gave two freehold houses to H.P. and T.H.W., respectively, in precisely similar terms.

Held: (i) in s. 7 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, which allowed a registered trade union to hold property, the word "purchase" was used in the ordinary sense as meaning to buy for money and not in the technical sense as meaning to acquire otherwise than by descent or escheat; and as the trade union could not hold land except under the Act, the gift to it was void; (ii) the gifts to the donees must be construed literally as conferring on each donee an estate during his own life and the life of the person who on his death became his heir; thereafter there was an intestacy so that the freehold houses went to the testator's heir and the leasehold house to his next-of-kin.

Notes. The words "not exceeding one acre" in s. 7 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, were repealed by s. 207 and Sched. 7 of the Law of Property Act, 1925 (20 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 427 et seq.).

Adjourned Summons by the executors of the testator, James Amos, to determine the construction of the gifts contained in the will.

By his will, dated Oct. 20, 1888, the testator, James Amos, a boiler maker, appointed executors, and after directing the payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses the testator gave to Thomas Price, a leasehold house, No. 27, Bath Terrace, New Swindon, in the county of Wiltshire, the conditions to be as follows:

"That the property be left to him for his life and for the life of his heir, after

A which it becomes the property of the Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders Society."

In identical words and with the same conditions the testator also gave to Henry Poole, a freehold house, No. 41, Regent Street, New Swindon; and to Thomas Henry Williams, a freehold house, No. 40, Regent Street, New Swindon. The testator then directed as follows:

B "That each of the above keep the property held by them in good repair, and shall pay to the trustees the sum of 4s. per week until the whole of the mortgage be paid; and that the further sum of £3 6s. 8d. each per annum should be paid by them to be disposed of as follows: viz., £5 per annum to the Boiler Makers Benevolent Fund and £5 per annum to the executors. Should either
C of the parties refuse or fail to comply with the foregoing conditions, they shall forfeit all right to the property, and the executors shall cause the same to be handed over to the Boiler Makers Society forthwith."

No residuary devise or bequest was contained in the will.

The United Society of Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders was instituted on Aug. 20, 1834, and was duly registered as a trades union, under the Trade Union
D Acts, 1871 and 1876; and the rules of the society were also registered with the registrar. It was not necessary, in order that a member should be entitled to receive out of the funds of the society the allowances and benefits provided by the rules, that he should be in poor circumstances; poverty was not a necessary ingredient in the qualification of members to receive the benefits of the society. The society was rather in the nature of a club or friendly society than a charitable
E institution. The question whether the society was a charity was raised in argument, but the validity of the gifts to the society in the will of the testator was decided independently of that question, which was not dealt with in the judgment. It was admitted that the Boiler Makers Benevolent Fund was a charity.

F J. C. Gordon for Henry Poole.

Hood for the heiress-at-law and next-of-kin of the testator.

Upjohn for the United Society of Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders and the Boiler Makers Benevolent Fund.

G NORTH, J.—Under the will the testator appoints two persons to be his executors, and directs "That all my just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses shall be paid as soon as conveniently may be after my decease."

There is no devise or bequest of any sort to those persons, although, of course, the personal estate would vest in them for the purpose of doing their duty as executors.

H Then comes this:

"I give, devise, and bequeath unto Thomas Price the property known as 27, Bath Terrace, New Swindon . . . the conditions to be as follows: That the property be left to him for his life and for the life of his heir, after which it becomes the property of the Boiler Makers and Iron Shipbuilders Society."

I Then two houses are given to two other persons in identical words, the only difference being that the first house is leasehold and the other two houses are freehold. The conditions in each case are exactly the same as those I have read. Then it is provided:

"That each of the above [that means each devisee] keep the property held by them in good repair, and shall pay to the trustees the sum of 4s. per week until the whole of the mortgage be paid."

That, I take it to be clear, throws the burden of the mortgage on the three houses in equal proportions, and all that is to be done is to pay the sum of 4s. per week until the whole is paid, if the mortgagee is content with that. If he wants more A he has his rights.

"And that the further sum of £3 6s. 8d. each per annum should be paid to them to be disposed of as follows—viz., £5 per annum to the Boiler Makers Benevolent Fund, and £5 per annum to the executors. Should either of the parties refuse or fail to comply with the foregoing conditions, they shall forfeit B all rights to the property, and the executors shall cause the same to be handed over to the Boiler Makers Society forthwith."

So that the limitation of each house is complete in itself to the devisee for the lives of himself and his heir, after which it becomes the property of the society. The society, therefore, under those words, would take in remainder after the estate given by the previous words. The final words are: C

"They shall forfeit all rights to the property, and the executors shall cause the same to be handed over to the Boiler Makers Society forthwith."

The point there is, the interim estate having come to an end, the Boiler Makers remainder is accelerated.

I think the most convenient way of dealing with the matter is to consider what D the effect of this gift to the Boiler Makers Society is. There are the two bodies mentioned—the Boiler Makers Society and the Boiler Makers Benevolent Fund. I think it is clear, when one looks at the rules, that the Boiler Makers Benevolent Fund merely means a fund administered by the Boiler Makers Society under r. 39. Under the rules a certain sum is appropriated as a benevolent fund, and is to be applied under the control of the executive council, and the meaning of this bequest, E as I read it, is to add £5 per annum to that fund, so that there will be so much more at the disposal of the persons who administer that fund. In my opinion, it is a gift to the Boiler Makers for the purposes of the benevolent fund which they have to administer.

Construing the ultimate gift first, what is meant by the property being handed over to the Boiler Makers Society? That is a trades union, registered under the Act of 1871, but not a corporation in any way. It is a body which exists for F certain purposes contemplated by the Act, but for no others. In my opinion, the bequest to the Boiler Makers Society is a bequest that cannot take any effect at all. In the first place, independently of the Act, what is the meaning of it? It is, beyond question, a perpetuity, or a gift tending to a perpetuity. It is not for the benefit of the particular individuals constituting the society at the time. It was suggested that the gift might have the effect of vesting all the property it comprises G in the existing members as joint tenants or tenants in common. But, in my opinion, it has no such meaning. That is not the effect of the gift. If it were, it would be entirely contrary to the testator's intention, because, instead of the property being administered by the executive body of the Boiler Makers Society for the purposes of the society, it would be a property belonging to a number of individuals as their common property, with respect to which anyone might at any moment commence an action for partition or sale, taking the control out of the society altogether, and simply dividing the property among themselves. That is not the intention of the testator. The only other thing is this: It is a gift to the society for the purposes of the society. But beyond all question that is a perpetuity, and the authorities which have been cited of Carne v. Long (1) and the observations of HALL, V.-C., in Re Clark's Trusts (2) are conclusive on the point. I

Besides, there is another difficulty. I do not understand how this body is capable of taking land in any way, whether for a perpetuity or anything else. It is said that, assuming that to be so, the Trade Union Act, 1871, authorises the union to receive this land and to hold the land. The Trade Union Act, 1871, s. 7, provides:

"It shall be lawful for any trade union registered under this Act to purchase or take upon lease in the names of the trustees for the time being of such union

A any land [not exceeding one acre] and to sell, exchange, mortgage, or let the same."

It is said here that this trades union takes these three separate houses in remainder under the will because it is lawful for them to purchase; and it is said that "purchase" means "acquire otherwise than by descent or escheat," and therefore B a devise or bequest of property operates as conferring on the person to whom it is given an interest by purchase, because he has not acquired it by descent.

In my opinion, that is not the meaning of the word "purchase" as used here. No doubt "purchase" is sometimes legally used in that sense, but that is not the natural ordinary meaning of the word. It is something additional to the ordinary meaning of the word, and is a meaning which it has sometimes. But, in my C opinion, it is not the meaning of the word in this section. If it were, I should have to alter the section very much. First of all, it is to be lawful for them to "purchase, or take upon lease." If "purchase" meant "acquire otherwise than by descent or escheat," taking on lease would be a "purchase" and the words "or take on lease" would be absurd; they would be tautologous, they would be suggesting as an alternative what is comprised in the previous words. But "purchase or take on lease" are put in contrast with one another—"purchase" referring, I D do not say necessarily, to a purchase out and out on payment of a sum down, as distinguished from a yearly tenancy at a yearly rent. I do not say "purchase" means nothing else. I think it would be satisfied by their buying up a lease. I think, if they bought up an existing lease, it would be a "purchase" within the meaning of that section; but by "purchase or take on lease," I understand to be

E meant acquiring by paying money for property which they acquire by purchase, or, if they pleased, property which they might take a lease of.

Then again, the subsequent words are not immaterial. What is contemplated is a purchase in the names of the trustees for the time being. How a devise to the society could be a purchase in the names of the trustees for the time being, I fail to understand. Then again, the rest of the section limits the amount to be taken F to "any land [not exceeding one acre]." That again points to the acquisition for particular purposes connected with the administration of their duties among their members, of land probably for an office. I do not say it is confined to that only. There might be other purposes for which it would be desirable to get it; but that is the sort of thing which it is considered the acquisition of land might be desirable for. But in my opinion it has nothing to do with the acquisition of land as forming G part of the substratum of the society itself. In my opinion this power to take land by "purchase or on lease" does not authorise this society to take land by devise under the terms of this will. Therefore the devise to them is void, and the person to take would be the heir-at-law as to the two freehold houses, and the next-of-kin as to the leasehold.

Then there is the bequest of £5 a year to the Boiler Makers Benevolent Fund. I cannot distinguish that from the gift in remainder to the Boiler Makers Union. H This, in my opinion, was an interim gift to them for the purposes of their benevolent fund by way of anticipation of what they would get when the life interest came to an end, and, in my opinion, that is a gift connected with the land. It is made payable by the person who has the land, and, in my opinion, it is open to objection on many grounds, one being that it is contrary to the Statute of Mortmain.

I The only remaining question is, what is the interest the tenants for life take? I confess I do not understand what the testator had in his mind in the language he used, and all I can do is to construe it as I find it. In my opinion the property is left to each legatee for a limited interest, the limited interest being what is described as his life and the life of his heir. For his life it is clearly good. The question is whether the interest he takes comes to an end upon his death, the interest for the life of his heir being too vague to be recognised. I do not see anything in point of law to prevent the gift being a good gift. There is no hiatus of any sort. The gift to him for his life would necessarily come to an end at his death, but at the very moment at which he dies the person who is his heir is ascertained; and I see nothing discontinuous in the limitation which prevents a limitation so made being a good one. A

Then, as to the person to take, I see no ground for saying that the heir takes beneficially. In my opinion, it is a limitation to the tenant for lives, the lives being his own and his heir's in each particular case. I see nothing to prevent it being good, I think that is what the testator meant by the words, and I see nothing in law to prevent their taking effect. I will make a declaration that the costs of the proceedings are a charge on the estate, as far as the trustees are concerned, as between solicitor and client. The two annual payments are void. I do not rule that the heir is entitled. The payment to the executors and the payment to the benevolent fund are both void. They are conditions subsequent, and as the person who takes the land cannot legally pay them, he is not liable to forfeit his land by not doing what he cannot legally do. Henry Poole is the person who takes 41, Regent Street, for the period during which he lives and the life of the person who at his death shall be his heir; and as regards the leasehold I think the same thing applies, the word heir, although he cannot take the leasehold, being a mode of describing the life that has to be added to that of the first taker. ## Re WALKER. MEREDITH v. WALKER F

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Kekewich, J.), March 3, 4, 10, 1893]

Solicitor—Lien—Costs—Work done in capacity of land agent—Payment of premiums on life policies assigned to him as security for mortgagees. G

By indentures of assignment the testator, who lived in England, assigned to M. B. two policies on his life. M. B. had for many years acted as solicitor and land agent for the testator on his estate in Ireland, and the policies were assigned to him as trustee to secure to mortgagees the repayment of a loan on Irish property. M. B. acted as solicitor both for the testator and the mortgagees. M. B. died on July 19, 1889, and the testator died on Mar. 14, 1890. C. B., widow and executrix of M. B., claimed to have a lien on the proceeds of the policies in court for two sums of money: (i) in respect of professional charges of M. B. acting as solicitor to the testator; (ii) partly for work done as a land agent, and partly for two premiums in respect of the assigned policies paid by M. B. for the testator. The chief clerk allowed a claim made by the mortgagees, but disallowed the claim of C. B. to be entitled to a lien on the proceeds of the policies. On a summons by C. B. to vary the chief clerk's certificate. H

Held: (i) as to the professional charges of M. B. incurred while acting as the testator's solicitor, C. B., as M. B.'s personal representative, was entitled to a lien subject to the mortgage; (ii) this lien applied only to work done in his capacity as solicitor and did not extend to work done as a land agent; (iii) as to the premiums paid by M. B., C. B. was entitled to be repaid out of the proceeds of the fund in court. I

F By an indenture of assignment, dated 25 June, 1874, the testator assigned to Michael Bourke a life policy in the Standard Life Assurance Co. numbered 52,409 N., dated April 30, 1874, for the sum of £800. By an indenture of assignment, dated May 29, 1883, the testator assigned to Michael Bourke another life policy in the same company numbered 54,217 N., and dated April 13, 1883, for the sum of £500. Pursuant to an order made for the convenience of all parties in the action and dated Dec. 8, 1890, a sum of £1,490 7s. 4d. was paid into court by the Standard Life Assurance Co.

H Michael Bourke for many years acted as solicitor and agent for the testator, who lived in England, Bourke managing as agent for the testator the Waterpark estate in the county of Cork. This estate being subject to certain mortgages, the two policies were assigned by the testator to Michael Bourke as a trustee to secure to certain other persons the moneys owing to them upon the mortgages. Michael Bourke acted as solicitor for the testator and for the mortgagees.

I The sum of £228 7s. 11d., being the first item in respect of which his widow, Caroline Bourke, claimed a lien, was made up of general professional charges of Michael Bourke as solicitor, against the testator, incurred between May 18, 1882, and October, 1888. The sum of £147 12s. 10d., being the second item in respect of which Caroline Bourke claimed a lien, was partly in respect of work done by Michael Bourke as land agent, and also included two insurance premiums, namely, £56 17s. 6d. and £53 18s. 8d. paid by Michael Bourke for the testator. Michael Bourke died on July 19, 1889, and the testator died on Mar. 14, 1890. The chief clerk allowed the claim of the mortgagees to a charge on the moneys in court, but disallowed the claim of Caroline Bourke to have a charge or lien on the said moneys.

KEKEWICH, J.—The money in court represents two policies granted by the Standard Life Assurance Co. on the life of John Tyrwhit Walker, the testator. The money was paid into court under an order dated Dec. 8, 1890, for the B general convenience of all parties in the action, that the insurance company may be indemnified, the money received from the company, and kept in medio pending the decision of the court. There was an inquiry, and the chief clerk made his certificate, and now there is a summons to vary the certificate, the application being made by Caroline Bourke, the legal personal representative of Michael Bourke, the solicitor and land agent of the testator. C

The applicant seeks to vary the certificate in three particulars. The certificate found nothing due to her, and, as representative of her husband Michael Bourke, she seeks to have it declared that there is due to her a considerable sum which ought to be paid out of the proceeds of the policies. The items are stated as two: first, £228 7s. 11d. for costs and disbursements due to Bourke as solicitor; secondly, £147 12s. 10d., balance due for services rendered and money paid. The D sum of £147 12s. 10d. is divisible in this way: two sums of £56 17s. 6d. and £53 18s. 8d. are claimed in respect of two premiums paid by Michael Bourke, and sought to be recovered from the estate of the testator. The balance of the £147 12s. 10d. is money said to be due to the applicant on the ground that Bourke was the testator's agent for landed property in Ireland. There is something due, there is no contest as to the amount; but the defence as to this part is, that E the money is due to Bourke only in his character of land agent, and a solicitor can have no lien in the different character of a land agent. Counsel for the applicant urged that solicitors derived much profit from agency business, though not properly the business of a solicitor, and were so entitled to a solicitor's lien in respect of it. But being pressed, he did not carry his argument further. Whether it is expedient that a solicitor should do other business or not, the law F is settled that a solicitor's lien extends only to debts due to him for work done and money spent in his character of solicitor; and the business of a land agent and solicitor being distinct, this part of the claim fails.

The rest of the item consists of the two premiums: as regards those also I do not see how lien attaches in respect of the policies. The premiums were paid by Bourke on behalf of Walker; it is not argued that Bourke had a lien for them G in his character of solicitor. The claim may be put on many grounds, and the applicant, in my opinion, is entitled to succeed as to the premiums. I must not say, with Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co. (1) before me, that she is entitled on the ground of salvage. In the head-note I read (34 Ch.D. at p. 234):

"Seemle the maritime doctrine of salvage has no application to the payment H of premiums on a policy."

Both BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., held that the doctrine of maritime salvage did not apply to such a matter as a claim for premiums paid by an agent. But the agent is not therefore precluded from being repaid the money by his principal. These policies were assigned to Bourke. If Bourke paid the premiums because he was the owner of the policies and could only keep the policies alive by paying I the premiums, it seems to me that Walker's estate cannot redeem without paying the premiums which Bourke paid so as to preserve the property. If Bourke had not paid the premiums, there would have been no policies at all. On the general rules of equity, in my opinion, Walker's estate must repay the premiums. This case differs from Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co. (1) as to the relations of the parties. The moneys were paid by Bourke at the request of Walker; that gives a right to be repaid out of the policies; anyhow it would give a right of action, and Bourke would be able to recover the amount, whether you call it

A set-off or something else. It is impossible for the testator's estate to recover the money without paying these premiums. On any of the grounds Mrs. Bourke has a right that these two premiums should be paid out of the proceeds of the policies in court. There is this difficulty: it is said that the premiums are contained in an agency account; but if Mrs. Bourke has a charge in the policies, she is entitled to marshal the security so as to throw the sums on the policies.

B The other item is a clean item of costs, £228 7s. 11d. It is said that for these costs Bourke had no lien. Why? The policies were in his possession, policies on his client's life, policies of the kind to which lien attaches. The policies were assigned to Bourke for the purpose of raising money; the only question is the rights of the mortgagees. Mrs. Bourke does not claim against the mortgagees—it would have been useless; but she claims subject to the mortgage, and independently of the mortgagees that she is entitled to a lien. I must assume that she has the policies: I must consider that they are still in her hands, and she must be treated as sitting upon them. The answer to her claim is, that the lien could not have existed when the policies were delivered to Bourke, and not having existed then cannot exist now. Lien is of a possessory character; a man must not only have possession, but also possession on behalf of a client. The two policies were never delivered to Bourke to hold on behalf of Walker; they were assigned to him for the purpose of raising money for Walker. Though there was no declaration of trust, it is conceded that Bourke held the policies for that purpose. If so, why does not lien attach as against Walker, but subject to the mortgage?

E I am referred to some cases; but I do not see that any of them prevent me with ordinary justice from giving effect to the lien. In Re Snell (2), SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., says (6 Ch.D. at p. 107):

"Can a solicitor, who in the preparation of a mortgage acts both for mortgagor and mortgagee, claim a lien upon the title deed for costs due to him from the mortgagor, so as to be entitled to withhold the deeds from his mortgagee client until payment of those costs?"

F Again, in Macfarlane v. Lister (3), COTTON, L.J., says (37 Ch.D. at p. 94):

"I am of opinion that the order is wrong so far as it gives the lien of the solicitors priority over the mortgage of the appellants."

G The way in which it is put shows that it is conceded that the lien does not exist against the mortgagor. There is nothing in the words of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., or COTTON, L.J., to show that as against the mortgagor the lien does not remain. Again, COTTON, L.J., says (ibid.):

"In Re Snell (2) the title deeds were in the hands of the solicitors, who acted for both parties. Their duty as solicitors for the mortgagee was to obtain the title deeds for him, and it was held that they could not insist on a right which they could only acquire by neglecting their duty to him and retaining them as solicitors to the mortgagor."

H There is nothing there to show that the solicitor could not insist on his lien as against the mortgagor. I expressed a similar view in Brunton v. Electrical Engineering Corpn. (4). There is no case against that view; and certainly BACON, V.-C.'s decision in Re Messenger, Ex parte Calvert (5), confirms it. The Vice-Chancellor says (3 Ch.D. at pp. 318, 319):

"The law is clear that a person who from his position has a right of lien, does not lose that right unless there is some special agreement that he shall do so. No such agreement is alleged in the present case. Is not then the result this, that the property was subject to the mortgage, and also to the solicitor's lien?"

The Vice-Chancellor cites Colmer v. Ede (6) in support of that view, and says, in the terse language he was accustomed to use, that property may be subject to a mortgage, and also to a solicitor's lien. I think I should be cutting down the well-established right of a solicitor to lien, if I were to hold, merely because a mortgage was made to clients of his, and he held the deeds of the mortgage, that he should lose his lien. Where the deeds remain in the solicitor's possession, I think the lien is preserved subject to the mortgage. A

Counsel for the defendants relied on the law of bankers, namely, that if a cheque is handed over for a particular purpose, it cannot be retained except for that particular purpose. What is the purpose here? The policies were assigned to Bourke by Walker for the purpose of raising money thereon, and subject thereto for Walker. Therefore, in my opinion, the solicitor is entitled to a specific lien subject to the mortgage. B

The certificate, therefore, must be varied by finding that Mrs. Bourke is entitled to the two sums for solicitor's costs and the premiums, and she must have her costs. The defendants must also have their costs, and the applicant having served the plaintiff, he must have his costs, though the action is not intituled a creditor's action. C

Re RYMER. RYMER v. STANFIELD

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Herschell, L.C., Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.), November 5, 6, 1894]

Charity—Cy-près doctrine—General charitable intent—Failure of object—Named charity ceasing to exist—Seminary for education of priests—Seminary existing at date of will—Closure before date of testator's death.

By his will dated August 2, 1883, a testator bequeathed the following legacy: "To the rector for the time being of St. Thomas' Seminary for the education of priests in the diocese of Westminster, for the purposes of such seminary, £5,000." The testator died on June 5, 1893. At the date of the will there existed at Hammersmith a seminary for the education of Roman Catholic priests for the diocese of Westminster known as St. Thomas' Seminary, but it was closed in March, 1893, the buildings were sold, and the students were removed to another seminary near Birmingham. G

Held: the bequest was not a general charitable gift, but a gift to a particular institution, and that, as that institution had ceased to exist at the testator's death, the legacy was not to be applied cy-près, but lapsed and fell into the residue. H

Appeal by the Attorney-General from a decision of CHITTY, J., reported [1895] 1 Ch. 19.

G

By his will dated August 2, 1883, Horatio Rymer, after bequeathing certain specific and pecuniary legacies, devised and bequeathed all his estate to his executors on trust to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses, and to pay and appropriate the legacies thereinbefore and thereafter given, and he directed that his trustees should stand possessed of certain legacies which were settled as therein mentioned. The will continued:

H

"Subject to and after payment and satisfaction of the beforementioned legacies and the duties thereon, I give the following charitable legacies to the following institutions and persons respectively, all subject to legacy duties, that is to say, to the rector for the time being of St. Thomas' Seminary for the education of priests in the diocese of Westminster for the purposes of such seminary £5,000; and I direct that the said rector shall at his discretion make a settlement thereof by deed in the names of proper trustees so as to make the same a permanent fund. And I direct that the candidates to be educated out of the income of this bequest shall be nominated from time to time by the rector of such seminary. And I request, but not as a condition to this bequest, that a yearly mass for the repose of my soul may be said at the said seminary in perpetuity, and that a yearly mass for the same object may be said during life by each of the priests who may have been educated wholly or on part in this foundation."

I

The testator then gave a legacy of £2,000 to Cardinal Manning or the Archbishop of Westminster for the time being, to be applied for the purposes of the Westminster Diocesan Education Fund at discretion, and bequeathed other charitable legacies to a large amount, some of £2,000 and some of £1,000, and in each case he gave the legacy to the manager of the charity "for the purposes of such charity." The testator died on June 5, 1893. A

At the date of the will St. Thomas' Seminary was in existence. It was established in or about 1869 at Hammersmith, for the education of priests in the diocese of Westminster and was carried on without break and with a complete staff of professors and teachers. It was supported partly by payments made by or on behalf of the students, and partly by the income of funds belonging to the diocese and applicable for the purpose. Cardinal Manning predeceased the testator and at the testator's death Cardinal Vaughan was Archbishop of Westminster. Prior to the death of Cardinal Manning it had been found that the expenses of carrying on the seminary at Hammersmith were heavier than the resources available could discharge, and shortly before Lady Day, 1893, such of the students as were ready for ordination were ordained, and the rest of the students were removed to Oscott, near Birmingham, where a seminary had been established by the Bishop of Birmingham, and was carried on by the bishop as president, for the education of priests for Westminster, Birmingham and certain other dioceses in England. B

The executors took out a summons to determine whether the legacy of £5,000 to "the rector for the time being of St. Thomas' Seminary" had lapsed and fallen into the residuary estate, and if it had not lapsed how it should be dealt with. CHITTY, J., held that the legacy had lapsed and fallen into residue. The Attorney-General appealed. C

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—In spite of the able argument which has been addressed to us by counsel for the Attorney-General, I entertain no doubt that the judgment of CHITTY, J., in this case was right. F

The first step to be taken is to construe the will of the testator. [HIS LORDSHIP read the terms of the bequest and continued:] That bequest is followed by a number of other bequests—legacies of £2,000 each are given to certain persons for school and orphanage purposes, the bequest in each case being described as given for the purposes of that particular institution. Then follow legacies of £1,000 each, given to representatives of institutions having some of the same objects precisely as the previous gifts, the legacy being limited in the case of these particular institutions to £1,000. G

The contention on behalf of the Attorney-General is, that from the gift now in question is to be inferred an intention on the part of the testator to benefit the priests by educating them quite apart from their education taking place in or in connection with this particular seminary; and that it is quite immaterial that the testator has designated that particular seminary, for the gift can be regarded as a charitable one, which must take effect even though that seminary should have ceased to exist at the time of the death of the testator. H

I am unable to construe this bequest. I think in all these cases (and they may all be looked at for the purpose of throwing light on this bequest) the testator had in view particular institutions, and although their object may be the same he graduates his bounty towards them, showing that it was the education of the orphans at this institution, or that which he had in his mind, and not merely the education of orphans, if I may say so, at large. In the first place, I observe that he says: I

"I give the following charitable legacies to the following institutions and persons."

- A The persons are named in connection with the institutions. There is no institution named except in connection with a person, and therefore he indicates at the outset that the legacy is to be a legacy to the institution, although he names the officers of the institution which is to take it. It seems to me, therefore, that we start with that indication. Then the testator mentions St. Thomas' Seminary, it is true, in conjunction with the words "for the education of priests in the diocese of
- B Westminster." It is said that those are his own words, and not part of the title. But it would be obviously a piece of prudence to insert those words in order to make sure that the bequest should go to the St. Thomas' Seminary which he had in view, and not to any institution which might possibly have existed as St. Thomas' Seminary not having that object and being a different institution. But the gift is to be for the purpose of such seminary, and then it is to be observed that, although
- C he does not make it a condition of the gift, he does couple it with the request that a yearly mass for the repose of his soul may be said at the said seminary. The whole is localised and connected with that institution, as distinctly, it seems to me, as a bequest could be. That is the construction which I put upon the language which the testator has used. There did exist such an institution as St. Thomas' Seminary, answering in every respect the description given. That institution was
- D no longer in existence at the time of the death of the testator.

Counsel for the Attorney-General contends that under those circumstances, and on the cy-près doctrine, the gift ought still to be treated as charitable and to be applied to some cognate purpose. In support of this contention—when once the construction had been arrived at which I have put upon the will—I have been unable to find that they have cited a single authority. They placed reliance upon the decision of LORD ELDON in Moggridge v. Thackwell (2) and Mills v. Farmer (3). The nature of those cases and the effect of the decisions are, I think, very well emphasised in a short passage in LORD ELDON's judgment in the latter case. He points out that giving property "to such persons as I shall name to be my executors," and appointing no executors, leaves that in the case of an individual a void gift. He says (1 Mer. at pp. 94, 95):

- F "But to give effect to a bequest in favour of charity, the court, will in both instances, supply the place of an executor and carry into effect that which, in the case of individuals, must have failed altogether. This distinction has proceeded partly perhaps on principles in the Roman law which we do not at this time perfectly comprehend, and partly, no doubt, on the religious notions
- G which formerly obtained in this country, according to which it fell to the ordinary's province to distribute in case of intestacy. A third principle which it is now too late to call in question is, that in all cases in which the testator has expressed an intention to give to charitable purposes, if that intention is declared absolutely, and nothing is left uncertain but the mode in which it is to be carried into effect, the intention will be carried into execution by this court, which will then supply the mode which alone was left deficient."

- H That was the principle established in Moggridge v. Thackwell (2), as well as in Mills v. Farmer (3), and, of course, would cover a considerable class of cases. The testator has defined the general character of the charity which he has in view, but has left the objects to be specified by a particular individual who can no longer specify them. That is one illustration of it, but, of course, many might be given
- I which all come within the language to which I have referred.

Reference is made to another class of cases, such as De Costa v. De Pas (4), where there was a gift for a charitable purpose which the court held to be illegal, and to which therefore it could not give effect. In those cases, seeing that there was a charitable purpose, but one to which the courts could not give effect, the courts have applied the money, designed in their view for charity, upon the cy-près doctrine in some fashion, or, at all events, in some charitable fashion other than that designated by the testator. Of course, that is a class of cases which we need not further discuss in connection with the one now before the court.

But then follow a series of cases of another description, although coming within the same principle, it may be said, as Moggridge v. Thackwell (2) and Mills v. Farmer (3). The first of those is Loscombe v. Wintringham (5), where a bequest of £500 was given for a society for the encouragement of servants in good conduct. No such society was known to exist, and we may take it that none did exist. The court there said that there was a charitable purpose; the machinery for carrying it into effect—the channel through which it should be carried into effect—has not been designated by the testator, but nevertheless the court will carry it into effect. That was also the view taken in Re Clergy Society (6), which was a society named, but which might as well have been left unnamed, because there was no such society existing. So also in Re Maguire (7), where a Church Pastoral Aid Society in Ireland was mentioned, which was likewise a non-existing society. Those cases also form a class which has been established upon the same principles and considerations, I think, as guided the court in Moggridge v. Thackwell (2) and Mills v. Farmer (3) and that class of cases. But they do not seem to me to be cases at all governing the present, when once the construction has been put on the will which I have put on the will of this testator.

One other case I may allude to in connection with the class of cases beginning with Loscombe v. Wintringham (5), which I have just mentioned, Biscoe v. Jackson (8). It seems to me that COTTON, L.J., and LINDLEY, L.J., in delivering their judgment in that case, so far from using language favouring the argument on behalf of the Attorney-General in the present case, seemed to assume the case against the appellant upon the construction which I have put upon the will. They decided in favour of the bequest there on the ground that it was not a bequest to any particular institution, but a bequest for a purpose which, if it could not be carried out precisely in the way named, must be carried out as nearly as possible.

I come now to another class of cases within which the present case falls. The first of those is Clark v. Taylor (1), where reliance was placed upon Loscombe v. Wintringham (5), but the judge declined to decide the case in the same way as Loscombe v. Wintringham (5) had been decided, because KINDERSLEY, V.-C., regarded that case as distinguishable. He did not intend to impugn that case, as he said, in the slightest degree, but he regarded it as not governing the case then before him. The language which he uses (and there are few judges more careful in the use of their language or more accurate) is this (1 Drew. at p. 644):

“There is a distinction well settled by the authorities. There is one class of cases in which there is a gift to charity generally, indicative of a general charitable purpose, and pointing out the mode of carrying it into effect. If that mode fails the court says the general purpose of charity shall be carried out. There is another class in which the testator shows an intention not of general charity, but to give to some particular institution, and if it fails because there is no such institution, the gift does not go to charity generally. That distinction is clearly recognised, and it cannot be said that, wherever a gift for any charitable purpose fails, it is nevertheless to go to charity. In many cases it is difficult to see to which particular class the case is to be referred, and this is to a certain extent one of such cases.”

There the Vice-Chancellor lays down the distinction in the clearest terms. It is said that in that case the facts show that the institution had not ceased to exist till after the death of the testator; that, therefore, the decision of the Vice-Chancellor must be read as referable to such a case; and that, if so, his decision has been overruled. I cannot think that any such point was raised in that case. It is true that on the statement of facts it would seem to have arisen, but then the statement of facts is now shown to be inaccurate. The report states that the testator died in October, 1840, and an examination of the record has shown that the testator did not die till October, 1846. It is true that DREWRY's report states that the institution came to an end in November, 1846, which would have shown that it survived the testator by a month or part

A of a month. But it is just as likely that there has been some mistake in the date of the cessation of the institution as in the date of the death of the testator. At all events, it is to me inconceivable that, if such a point existed, and it could have been argued in that case, that Mr. Wickens, who argued for the Crown, should not have made the point, and that there should be no allusion to it whatsoever in the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor. I, therefore, cannot regard
B the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor in Clark v. Taylor (1) as otherwise than a decision upon the point which it purports to decide in the judgment, and as having no relation to the fact that the institution had survived the testator. That clearly was the view taken by Wood, V.-C., in Fisk v. A.-G. (9). He had there a similar point before him. The institution was, I think, the Women's Benevolent Institution at Liverpool, and the institution had come to an end
C before the death of the testator. The Vice-Chancellor followed Clark v. Taylor (1), and held that, having so come to an end, the gift failed altogether.

I pass by Russell v. Kellest (10), because on the facts of the case there may be some discussion as to how far the principle was properly applied, but the same principle was recognised by STUART, V.-C., in that case. It was afterwards recognised and followed in Re Ovey, Broadbent v. Barrow (11) by PEARSON, J.,
D and it seems to me that, in Re Slevin, Slevin v. Hepburn (12), in this court, not the slightest dissent was expressed from the view of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., in Clark v. Taylor (1), but rather the contrary. In delivering the judgment of the court, KAY, L.J., says ([1891] 2 Ch. at p. 243):

E "In the present case we think that the Attorney-General must succeed, not on the ground that there is such a general charitable intention that the fund should be administered cy-près, even if the charity had failed in the testator's lifetime, but because, as the charity existed at the testator's death, this legacy became the property of that charity, and on its ceasing to exist its property falls to be administered by the Crown."

F So that, so far from throwing any doubt upon Clark v. Taylor (1), it seems to me to recognise the distinction, and decides the case not on any ground inconsistent with Clark v. Taylor (1), but exclusively on the ground that, the charity having survived the testator, the bequest had taken effect, and when the charity ceased to exist its property fell to the administration of the Crown.

G One case was referred to which was said to be somewhat an exception to those with which I have been dealing, viz., Marsh v. A.-G. (13), and at first sight it appeared to be so. It was a gift to the President of the Nautical School at Deal, and the Nautical School at Deal was not in existence at the time of the death of the testator. But rightly or wrongly, it is quite immaterial to inquire, the court there came to the conclusion on the true construction of the will that the money was given to the president of that school, not for the benefit of the school, but that education might be given to certain boys. It was said that
H the trust would have been perfectly discharged by educating the boys at Oxford and Cambridge or elsewhere than at the school. It therefore really forms no exception in the construction put on the will to the cases to which I have been alluding.

I I think I have now referred to every one of the cases which have been relied on by counsel for the Attorney-General. They seem to me to lead to the conclusion that this case does not come within the class of cases the first of which is Clark v. Taylor (1), decided forty years ago, but which has been followed in numerous cases since; and that there is really no authority in any way conflicting with that series of decisions. Certainly on principle they seem to me to be sound, and I do not think it would be in accordance with sound principle, or that any prior decisions necessitate our holding that, where the conclusion is once arrived at that the main object of the testator or testatrix was to benefit a particular institution, that was of the essence of the bequest; and that if that institution has ceased to exist the charitable legacy ought still to be held as effectual, and the money to be applied by the court on the cy-près principle. A

For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think the result at which CHITTY, J., has arrived is right. I have attended to and followed the arguments of counsel for the Attorney-General, and with a great many of those arguments I concur. I think with counsel that it does not do to approach a will of this kind by a short cut by saying that there is a lapse, and that there is an end of the matter. It is begging the question whether there is a lapse or not. The court must construe the will, and see what the real object of the language which it has to interpret is. I will not read the words of this gift again. I have read them very often, and studied them with care. I cannot arrive at the conclusion at which counsel for the Attorney-General wants me to arrive, that this is in substance and in truth a bequest of £5,000 for the education of priests in the diocese of Westminster. I do not think it is. It is a gift of £5,000 to a particular seminary for the purposes thereof, and I do not think it is possible to get out of that. I think the context shows it—the choice of candidates, and prayers and so on. If you get thus far then you ask yourself, “Does that seminary exist?” The answer here is, it does not. Then you arrive at the result that there is a lapse, and if there is a lapse, is there anything in the doctrine of cy-près to prevent the ordinary rule as to lapse from applying? I think not. Once you get the fact that there is a lapse, then it appears to me that all the authorities which are of any value tend to show that the residuary legatee takes the lapsed gift. We are asked, if the argument is pushed further, to overrule that doctrine which was laid down by KINDERSLEY, V.-C., in the earliest case of Clark v. Taylor (1), and also to overrule the doctrine of Fisk v. A.-G. (9). I think that the doctrine is perfectly right. There is always a difficulty in applying it, but when once you arrive at the fact that a gift to a particular seminary or institution, or whatever you may call it, is “for the purposes thereof,” and for no other purpose, if when once you get to the cessation of that institution or seminary, or whatever it is, and so you are driven to arrive at the conclusion that there is a lapse, there is an end of it. That is in accordance with the law, and in accordance with all the cases that can be cited. I quite agree that in coming to that conclusion you have to consider whether the mode of obtaining the object is machinery or not, or whether the mode is not the substance of the gift. Here it appears to me the gift to the seminary is the substance of the whole thing. It is the object of the testator. I think that that is so plain from the language used that it covers the case. Those are the short grounds of my judgment. I do not comment upon the various decisions, because the Lord Chancellor has done that sufficiently. B C E F G

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—It appears to me, in investigating whether CHITTY, J.’s judgment is correct, the first point we must make up our mind upon is this: H
Whether he is right upon the construction he has placed on this bequest, because the construction he has placed on this bequest is this, that it was a gift to a particular institution for the purposes of that institution. The Lord Chancellor and LINDLEY, L.J., have dealt with the question as to whether that is correct or not. I entirely agree with them. In my opinion that is a bequest to a particular institution for the purposes of that institution by the testator. When I once that is arrived at the cases cited by counsel for the Attorney-General seem to me to be tolerably plain. The difficulty in this case is to find out whether that is in reality the intention of the testator or not.

Having got to that, then the authorities appear to me to be all one way. They begin with Clark v. Taylor (1), as explained by the Lord Chancellor, and, as appears from the judgment of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., going on to Fisk v. A.-G. (9), decided by WOOD, V.-C., and then going on to the decision of PEARSON, J., in Re Ovey, Broadbent v. Barrow (11). I am not saying that Re Ovey (11) is

A a decision exactly applicable, but one sees how the learned judge deals with the law relating to cy-près when considering a bequest like this. There is also Biscoe v. Jackson (8), where COTTON, and LINDLEY, L.JJ., also deal with the principles of the law. It seems to me that from Clark v. Taylor (1) down to the last of those cases the authorities are all in sequence upon this point. Therefore I am of opinion that CHITTY, J., being right in the construction he put on the bequest, he is also right as to the law, and that, therefore, this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

CLEAVER v. MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Fry and Lopes, L.JJ.), November 2, 3, December 8, 1891]

[Reported [1892] 1 Q.B. 147; 61 L.J.Q.B. 128; 66 L.T. 220; 56 J.P. 180; 40 W.R. 230; 8 T.L.R. 139; 36 Sol. Jo. 106]

Husband and Wife—Assurance policy by husband for benefit of wife—Wife to benefit if surviving husband—Murder of husband by wife—Right of husband's estate to policy money.

F Public Policy—Criminal not allowed to benefit from crime.

By s. 11 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882: "A policy of assurance effected by any man on his own life, and expressed to be for the benefit of his wife . . . shall create a trust in favour of the objects therein named, and the moneys payable under any such policy shall not, so long as any object of the trust remains unperformed, form part of the estate of the insured . . ." By a policy of life assurance taken out by a husband on Oct. 3, 1888, it was agreed that there should be payable to his wife, if living at the time of his death, the sum of £2,000. The husband died on May 11, 1889, and in August, 1889, the wife was convicted of having murdered him. On a claim under the policy by the administrator of the wife's property appointed under the Forfeiture Act, 1870, s. 9, and by the husband's executors,

H Held: it was against public policy to allow a criminal to claim any benefit by virtue of his crime, and so the wife had rendered incapable of performance the trust in her favour provided by s. 11 of the Act of 1882; accordingly, the policy money had become part of the husband's estate and was recoverable by his executors from the insurers.

Appeal from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (DENMAN and WILLS, JJ.) on questions of law which had been ordered to be decided by the court before the trial of any issues of fact.

On Oct. 3, 1888, James Maybrick became a member of the defendant company, and effected an insurance on his life with them for £2,000, it being thereby agreed that

"there shall be payable to Florence E. Maybrick, wife, if living at the time of the death of the said member, otherwise to the legal personal representatives of the said member, the sum of £2,000 sterling within ninety days after receipt of satisfactory evidence to the association of the death of the said member."

He died on May 11, 1889, and by his will appointed the plaintiffs, Thomas and Michael Maybrick as his executors. In August, 1889, Florence Maybrick was tried at the Liverpool Assizes and found guilty of having murdered her husband.

A Before her trial she assigned by deed to the plaintiff Richard S. Cleaver the policy and all her interest thereunder, and notice of the assignment was given to the defendants. On Aug. 30, 1889, Richard Cleaver was appointed administrator of the property and effects of Florence Maybrick under the provisions of the Forfeiture Act, 1870, which abolished forfeiture for treason and felony and gave the Crown power (see s. 9) to appoint an administrator of a convict's property [section 9

B was repealed by the Criminal Justice Act, 1948: see s. 70]. The sentence of death passed on Florence Maybrick was afterwards commuted to penal servitude for life. The defendant company refused to pay the money under the policy to Cleaver, the assignee, or to the executors of the husband and, upon this action being brought by Cleaver and the executors to recover the money, the following question of law was ordered to be decided by the court: Whether, if it be proved that James

C Maybrick died from poison intentionally administered to him by Florence Elizabeth Maybrick, that would afford a defence to this action (a) as against the plaintiff Cleaver as assignee of the policy from Florence Elizabeth Maybrick, assuming the assignment to be proved; (b) as against the plaintiff Cleaver as administrator, under the Forfeiture Act, 1870, s. 9; (c) as against the plaintiffs Thomas Maybrick and Michael Maybrick, as executors of James Maybrick, deceased. The Queen's

D Bench Division gave judgment for the defendants, on the ground that the wife would benefit by the plaintiff's success in the action, and that it was contrary to public policy to allow a person to gain a benefit by her own felonious act. The plaintiffs appealed.

By the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 11:

E " . . . A policy of assurance effected by any man on his own life, and expressed to be for the benefit of his wife, or of his children, or of his wife and children, or any of them, or by any woman on her own life, and expressed to be for the benefit of her husband, or of her children, or of her husband and children, or any of them, shall create a trust in favour of the objects therein named, and the moneys payable under any such policy shall not, so long as any object of the

F trust remains unperformed, form part of the estate of the insured, or be subject to his or her debts. . . . The insured may by the policy, or by any memorandum under his or her hand, appoint a trustee or trustees of the moneys payable under the policy, and from time to time appoint a new trustee or new trustees thereof, . . . In default of any such appointment of a trustee, such policy, immediately on its being effected, shall vest in the insured and his or her legal personal

G representative in trust for the purposes aforesaid . . . "

H Dec. 8, 1891. LORD ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiffs, as executors of the will of James Maybrick, deceased, are suing a life assurance company on a policy granted by them on the life of the deceased. The defendants admit the death of James Maybrick, and admit they granted the policy on his life; but they insist that they are not liable to pay to his executors the sum assured because they say the executors would hold the money in trust for the widow of the deceased, and his

I death was caused by the criminal act of his wife—that is to say, she murdered him. Therefore, they say it would be contrary to public policy to make them pay this money to the plaintiffs; in other words, they argue that public policy excuses and relieves them from the proper fulfilment of the contract they have entered into.

No doubt there is a rule of law that if a contract be entered into which is contrary to public policy, or if the performance of a contract would be contrary to public policy, the contract cannot be enforced either at law or in equity. But when persons use that rule to try and excuse themselves from the performance of a contract for which they have received full consideration, and when all that remains for them to do under the contract is to pay money, the rule should not be extended and its application should be very narrowly watched. I agree with a comparison, once drawn by a learned judge [BURROUGH, J., in Richardson v. Mellish (1)] of public policy with an unruly horse. The policy which James Maybrick entered into is drawn up in a peculiar form which is probably of late invention. It does not state on the face of it whom it is made with; but, after mentioning certain things, it says that James Maybrick had become a member of the defendant association, and that the defendants promise to pay to Florence E. Maybrick, his wife,

"if living at the time of the death of the said member, otherwise to the legal personal representatives of the said member, the sum of £2,000."

Looking at that policy, first, as if the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, had never existed, let us consider what the legal effect of it would be. It is made with James Maybrick only, with nobody else, his wife is no party to it. It cannot be enforced till he is dead, so it was clearly intended to be enforced by his legal personal representatives, who are the only persons who can do so. The condition upon which the money becomes payable is fixed by this contract: it is the death of James Maybrick. There is no exception as to his death being caused by the criminal act of his wife or anybody else; the only condition upon which the money is to become payable is his death, and that condition has been fulfilled. The only possible plaintiffs are the executors, so that, under the contract, the defendants have no defence apart from any question as to public policy. At common law, apart from the Act of 1882, what would be the effect of naming the wife in the contract as the payee of the money? As between the present plaintiffs and defendants it would have no effect whatever. She is no party to the contract, and the defendants would have no right to follow the money they are bound to pay so as to see whether the plaintiffs were observing the trusts declared concerning it. But, further than this, there would not have been any trusts here. James Maybrick might have altered the destination of the money either by his will or a settlement, and made it payable to someone else. If he had done so, the defendants could not have made any objection. The money is earmarked by mentioning the wife in the policy, but the fact of her being named in it gave her no rights at all; she could only have claimed the money at common law under her husband's will or a settlement. It seems that the question might arise how such a policy would have to be treated at law apart from the statute.

Supposing a will or settlement were made by the insured in favour of some person not named in s. 11 of the Act—such as a nephew or niece, for instance—the question would have to be considered at law independent of statute; and supposing the person who became entitled to the money under a will or settlement, was the criminal cause of the death of the assured, one would have to consider what would be the effect of the policy apart from the statute, and what defence could be raised to a claim under the policy. It is contrary to public policy that a person who commits a murder should benefit by his criminal act, but that doctrine ought not to be stretched one bit beyond what is necessary for the protection of the public. If the matter can be dealt with so that such a person shall not be benefited by his criminal act, the defendants ought not to be allowed to refuse payment on the ground that, though they may have received premiums regularly for perhaps twenty or thirty years, public policy requires that they should not pay but yet keep the premiums. If the rule about public policy is used in that way, I say that its application should be narrowly watched.

Under the circumstances of the present case it seems to me that no question of the application of the rule about public policy arises between the plaintiffs and the defendants; that question arises only between the plaintiffs and the widow of the deceased. When the plaintiffs have recovered the money from the defendants, then, if the claimant under the policy, or under the will or settlement, is guilty

A of the death of the deceased, he may be prevented by the crime from insisting on the payment of the money to him by the executors on the ground of public policy. In such a case the executors may deal with the matter on that footing. But when they have recovered the money they hold it, supposing that through his crime the claimant is disentitled to claim it, not for themselves, but as part of the estate of the deceased. Therefore, in this case if there were no Married Women's

B Property Act in existence, I should be of opinion that upon the true construction of the policy, the only people to whom the defendants are liable to pay this money are the only people who could give a valid receipt, namely, the executors. As between the plaintiffs and defendants no rule of public policy has any application. When they have got the money the plaintiffs must deal with it subject to any rule of public policy that may apply; but the defendants have nothing to do with

C that; it is a question that only concerns the plaintiffs, as executors, and the legatees.

But the case goes further than this. The contract is made with reference to s. 11 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, by which it is provided that a policy of insurance effected by any man on his own life, and expressed to be for the benefit of his wife or of his children, or of his wife and children, or any of them, shall create a trust in favour of the objects therein named, and the moneys payable

D under such policy shall not, so long as any object of the trust remains unperformed, form part of the estate of the insured or be subject to his debts. Under this section, therefore, a trust was created by the policy in favour of the wife. The trust does not exist always, but only so long as any object of it remains unperformed; when it has been performed, the money forms part of the estate of the deceased. The Act also provides that the insured may, by the policy, or any memorandum

E under his hand, appoint a trustee or trustees of the moneys payable under the policy and, in default of any such appointment of a trustee, such policy shall, immediately on its being effected, vest in the insured and his legal personal representatives in trust for the purposes aforesaid. No trustee having been appointed, the executors are trustees of the policy, "for the purposes aforesaid," that is, for the wife so long as the object of the trust remains unperformed. When

F the object ceases to remain unperformed, then the policy is to form part of the personal estate of the deceased. Suppose the wife had died before her husband, the defendants could not say to him that they would, in consequence, receive no more premiums, and refuse to go on with the policy because the trust for her could not be performed. In such a case I take it that the trust having become impossible to be performed, the matter must be treated as if the object of the trust had been

G performed.

Treating the case before us as a matter which is subject to the rule about public policy, the wife has rendered the trust in her favour incapable of performance. The trust must, therefore, be treated as if it had ceased to exist for, as the object of it cannot be performed, it cannot be said, using the words of the section, to remain unperformed. What is to happen in that case? The section says the

H money is to form part of the estate of the insured. Upon this construction of the section it is unnecessary to vouch the rule of public policy as between the executors and the defendants. The executors are entitled to recover the money from the defendants; and when they have got it, they will hold it as trustees for the estate of the deceased. If there are creditors it will go to them so far as may be necessary to satisfy their claims, and then, if there is anything left, and there are

I children, it will go to the children. Neither the wife nor anyone claiming through her have any right to the money, they are shut out by public policy; but the children claim through their father, not through their mother. There is nothing in such an arrangement contrary to public policy. It would be a great injustice if, in the name of public policy, the plaintiffs, and, therefore, the children of the deceased, were not allowed to succeed in this action. Anyone claiming through the wife is shut out by the rule of public policy, so that an assignee from her cannot recover the money; but as between the executors and the defendants the rule of public policy does not apply, and their rights and liabilities must be determined according to the contract which has been made. The only event mentioned in the contract as a condition on which the money was to become payable has happened, so that there is no defence to the action so far as the executors of the deceased are concerned, and they must succeed. As the assignee claims through the wife he must fail. I, therefore, disagree with the judgment of the Divisional Court, and this appeal will be allowed. A

FRY, L.J., read the following judgment:—Of the questions stated by the order of the master in this case one only has been argued before us, namely, whether the murder of James Maybrick by his wife Florence, if proved, would afford a defence to this action brought by the executors of James Maybrick. B

That question has been answered in the affirmative by the Divisional Court, and the judgment has been maintained before us by the same line of argument as was adopted by the court, which is shortly as follows: The executors of James Maybrick, it is said, are suing as trustees for Florence, and can have no better title than their cestui que trust. It is against public policy to allow a criminal to claim any benefit by virtue of his crime. She is, therefore, disentitled to claim the proceeds of the policy in question, and the executors, who are her trustees, are equally disentitled. This line of argument appears to me equally untenable whether there be or be not such a principle of public policy as that stated. If there be not, there is no objection to the action; if there be, it disqualifies Florence Maybrick from asserting that she is the cestui que trust of the executors, and negatives the proposition that the plaintiffs are suing for her benefit. They may be suing for their own benefit, or for the benefit of the estate of the deceased, or of some other person; but if the principle be valid, they cannot possibly be suing for her benefit. These observations are, to my mind, sufficient to dispose of the case; but, considering its importance and the fulness with which it has been argued, I shall descend somewhat more to detail. C

The principle of public policy invoked is, in my opinion, rightly asserted. It appears to me that no system of jurisprudence can with reason include among the rights which it enforces rights directly resulting to the person asserting them from the crime of that person. If no action can arise from fraud, it seems impossible to suppose that it can arise from felony or misdemeanour. It may be that there is no authority directly asserting the existence of this principle; but the decision of the House of Lords in Amicable Society v. Bolland (Fauntleroy's Case) (2) appears to proceed on this principle, and to be a particular illustration of it. This principle of public policy, like all such principles, must be applied to all cases to which it can be applied without reference to the particular character of the right asserted or the form of its assertion. In Fauntleroy's Case (2) it was held to prevent the assignees of a forger from claiming the benefit of a policy on his death at the hands of justice by reason of his forgery. It would equally apply, it appears to me, to the case of a cestui que trust asserting a right as such by reason of the murder of the prior tenant for life or of the assured in a policy; and it must so far be regarded in the construction of Acts of Parliament that general words which might include cases obnoxious to this principle must be read and construed as subject to it. D

James Maybrick insured his life by the policy in question in the year 1888, and by the proposal which was made part of the policy, he expressed the policy to be effected for the benefit of his wife, and in the policy itself she is named as the payee of the policy moneys in the event, which happened, of her surviving her husband. Independently of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the effect of this transaction was, in my opinion, to create a contract by the defendants with James Maybrick that the defendants would, in the event which has occurred, pay to Florence Maybrick the £2,000 assured; it would be broken by non-payment to her; but the cause of action resulting from such breach would vest in the executors of the assured, and not in the payee. She was, independently of the statute, a stranger to the contract; it might have been put an end to by the contracting E

A parties without her consent, and the breach of it would have given her no cause of action against anyone.

Section 11 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, deals with policies like the present, effected for the expressed benefit of a wife, and among other things contains these alternative provisions. It enables the insured to appoint a trustee or trustees of the moneys payable under the policy, and, in default of such appointment, it provides that the policy shall vest in the assured and his legal personal representatives. It is impossible to consider the insertion of the name of Florence Maybrick in the policy as the nomination of her as trustee for herself; there is no nomination of any other trustee; consequently, the statute applied, and, in spite of her nomination as payee, vested the policy in James Maybrick and his legal personal representatives, namely, the plaintiffs. The section in question goes further, and declares the trusts on which such a policy is to be held. According to its language, the effecting of this policy created a trust in favour of the object named, that is, Florence Maybrick; and the section enacted that the moneys payable under it should not, so long as any object of the trust remained unperformed, form part of the estate of the insured.

D The trust thus created by statute, and the language of the statute creating it, must, in my opinion, be both subject to the principle of public policy which I have stated, namely, the trust is one which cannot be enforced by a murderess of her husband—and the language of the statute must be read as if it contained an exception of such a case. Consequently, the trust which the statute was intended to create has either never arisen or it has, by the act of cestui que trust, become incapable of enforcement. If the executors of the insured were in such a case as the present to refuse to sue the office, it is inconceivable to me that the murderess could maintain a suit against them to enable her to use their names, or in fact that she could be allowed to sue in any way in a court of equity as cestui que trust of a fund which she had created by her crime.

E But if the executors are not trustees for Florence Maybrick, for whom are they trustees? This question seems to admit of an easy answer. Whenever there is property produced by the payments of A. which is held in trust for B., and that trust fails or is satisfied, a resulting trust arises for A. or his estate. This resulting trust is recognised by the section of the Act in question, because it takes the property out of the estate of the insured so long as any object of the trust remains unperformed—language which implies, if it does not assert, that when no object of the trust remains to be performed the policy moneys form part of the estate of the insured. If it be suggested that this view only removes the difficulty a step further off, and that the possible right of the wife under her husband's will or intestacy forms an objection to the action by the executors, the reply is obvious—that the principle of public policy must be applied as often as any claim is made by the murderess, and will always form an effectual bar to any benefit which she may seek to achieve as the result of her crime.

H It follows from the view which I have expressed that I think it needless to inquire what the particular trusts may be on which the convict's property is held by the administrator appointed under the statute of 1870. He took only the property which Florence Maybrick had in the moneys in question; and, as she took nothing, in my judgment, by reason of her crime, he takes nothing likewise.

I It may be argued that, having regard to the fact that Mrs. Maybrick is the prime object of the insurance, and that she is named on the face of the policy as payee, the contract of insurance must be taken to imply an exception of the case of the death of the insured, when caused by the crime of the person so named; and it is suggested that Fauntleroy's Case (2), in the House of Lords, supports this contention. This argument does not appear to me to be tenable. The policy is effected under, and, therefore, affected by, a statutory enactment, the effect of which in the present case is to vest the policy in the executors of the insured as trustees, in the event of Mrs. Maybrick being entitled to claim, in trust for her, and, in every other event, in trust for the estate of James Maybrick, just in the same way as if, before the statute, a policy had been taken out by James Maybrick, and he had, by a separate instrument, declared the like trusts of it. A

It is to my mind illogical to make the crime of one cestui que trust a bar to the claim of another, or of the trustees for that other cestui que trust; and if the supposed defence were to prevail, we should so hold. If Mrs. Maybrick had inflicted a mortal, but not immediately fatal, wound on her husband, and had then committed suicide leaving him surviving, and his executors had claimed on his death, it appears to me that the crime which caused his death would have furnished no defence. In a word, I think that the rule of public policy should be applied so as to exclude from benefit the criminal and all claiming under her, but not so as to exclude alternative or independent rights. In Fauntleroy's Case (2) the plaintiffs were the assigns of the criminal, and were claiming through him. In the present case the plaintiffs are the assigns in law of the innocent husband, and are claiming through him. The authority, therefore, of that case goes to show that neither Florence Maybrick nor the administrator of her estate, who claims through her, can take any benefit. But that appears to me to throw no impediment in the way of a suit by those who claim with clean hands themselves, and as assigns of the innocent insured. In a word, it appears to me that the crime of one person may prevent that person from the assertion of what would otherwise be a right, and may accelerate or beneficially affect the rights of third persons, but can never prejudice or injuriously affect those rights. B

In my opinion, therefore, public policy prevents Florence Maybrick from asserting any title as cestui que trust of this fund, and thereby brings into operation the resulting trust in favour of the estate of the insured, and so enables the executors to maintain an action as plaintiffs without any taint derived from the crime committed by Florence Maybrick. C

LOPES, L.J.—The plaintiffs are the legal personal representatives of James Maybrick, and the question for our decision is whether the crime of his wife, Florence Maybrick, prevents them from recovering the amount which became payable by the defendants under a policy on his life which set out the trusts to which the money was to be applied. The contract of insurance was made between the husband, on one side, and the defendants, on the other. The husband died by the criminal act of his wife. Upon his death the right to sue on the policy went to his executors. I have no doubt that there is a rule of public policy which would prevent the wife from recovering from the plaintiffs the money recovered by them under the policy, and so reaping a benefit from her crime. The simple answer in this case to the defence of public policy is that the executors are entitled to say that they are suing for the benefit of the estate of the husband, and, therefore, no question of public policy arises. This would have been the case, I think, even if the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, had not been passed. I agree with what the Master of the Rolls and FRY, L.J., have said—that s. 11 of that Act creates a resulting trust in favour of the husband or his legal personal representatives in case the trust in favour of the wife cannot be performed. The death of the husband having been caused in the present case by the criminal act of his wife, the trust in her favour must be regarded as having been struck out, and a resulting trust thereupon arises in favour of his estate. I, therefore, think that this appeal should be allowed. D

McCOWAN v. BAINE AND JOHNSTON. THE NIOBE

[HOUSE OF LORDS (The Earl of Selborne, Lord Watson, Lord Bramwell and Lord Morris), June 15, July 27, 1891]

7 Asp.M.L.C. 89]

Insurance—Marine insurance—Collision clause—Towed vessel—Collision between tug and another ship—Liability of owner of towed vessel—Identity of tow with tug.

By a policy of insurance, underwritten by the appellant, a ship owned by the respondents was insured "at and from the Clyde (in tow) to Cardiff and/or Penarth, while there, and thence to Singapore . . ." The policy contained a clause providing that "if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the insured shall, in consequence thereof, become liable to pay, and shall pay, to the persons interested in such other ship or vessel any sum or sums of money . . ." the underwriters would repay such sum to the insured. While the ship was being towed from the Clyde to Cardiff her tug came into collision with and damaged another vessel, whose owners recovered damages from the respondents.

Held: the ship and her tug must be regarded as if they were one vessel, and, therefore, although the insured ship did not actually come into contact with the damaged ship, the collision was a collision within the policy and the underwriter was liable to repay to the respondents the amount of the damages paid by them.

Appeal from a decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland (the Lord Justice-Clerk (LORD MACDONALD), LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFORD CLARK and LORD LEE), affirming a judgment of the Lord Ordinary, LORD TRAYNER.

By a policy of marine insurance effected by the respondents, the owners of the sailing ship Niobe, with the appellant, an underwriter, the ship was covered A

“At and from the Clyde (in tow) to Cardiff and/or Penarth, while there, and thence to Singapore . . .”

and it was provided that the underwriters should be liable

“if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the insured shall, in consequence thereof, become liable to pay, and shall pay, to the persons interested in such other ship or vessel, or in the freight thereof, or in the goods or effects on board thereof, any sum or sums of money, not exceeding the value of the ship hereby assured.” B

While the Niobe was on her way to Cardiff in tow of the Flying Serpent, her tug came into collision with the Valetta, causing her damage. The Valetta, after colliding with the tug, also came into contact with the Niobe, but without receiving any damage. In a suit before the Admiralty Court of England it was decided by LORD HANNEN that the collision was due to the fault of the tug in not porting her helm in terms of the regulations, and that the Niobe was likewise to blame in respect of her failure to keep a look-out and to control the steerage of her tug. The respondents had in consequence paid £12,909 to the owners of the Valetta, and they now sued one of the underwriters of the policy for his proportion of that sum. The action was heard by LORD TRAYNER, who gave judgment for the respondents, a decision which was affirmed by the Second Division of the Court of Session. The underwriter appealed. C

July 27, 1891. The following opinions were read. E

THE EARL OF SELBORNE.—I cannot help thinking that, in construing such a mercantile contract as this, there is as much danger of error in extreme literalism as in too much latitude; and though I do not adopt the argument that a contract of indemnity against the consequences of collision can be extended to a case in which there has been no collision, but only damages caused by measures properly taken to avoid a collision, I think a construction which makes it cover all damage consequent upon an actual collision, for which the assured is liable, is more reasonable and more in accordance with the probable intention of the parties, if the words will bear it, than one which does not. In the present case the Valetta was sunk by an actual collision, for which the owners of the Niobe have been held liable. But the impact which caused the loss of the Valetta was not that of the hull of the Niobe, but that of the steam-tug Flying Serpent, which was towing the Niobe on a part of her insured voyage, described in the policy of insurance as “in tow from the Clyde to Cardiff or Penarth.” F

The words of this contract are: “If the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel . . .” If a ship cannot be said to “come into collision with any other ship” except by direct contact, causing damage between the two hulls, including under the term hull all parts of a ship’s structure, there was in this case no such contact, and the appellant ought to succeed. But I cannot adopt so narrow a construction of those words. I should hold them to extend to cases in which the injury was caused by the impact, not only of the hull of the ship insured, but of her boats or steam-launch, even if those accessories were not (as in this case) insured, as being, in effect, parts of the ship. I should also hold them to cover an indirect collision, through the impact of the ship insured upon another vessel or thing capable of doing damage, which might by such impact be driven against the ship suffering damage. I should take the same view, as against insurers in similar terms, of a tug towing one or more barges (in which G

A case the barge-owners would not be liable for a collision) if damage to any vessel were caused by the barge or barges being driven against it through the improper navigation of the tug, although there might have been no impact of the tug itself upon the injured vessel.

After full consideration, it seems to me to be no more than a reasonable extension of the same principles to include within them such a case as the present. Where a ship in tow has control over, and is answerable for, the navigation of the tug, the two vessels—each physically attached to the other for a common operation, that of the voyage of the ship in tow, for which the tug supplies the motive power—have been said, by high authority, to be for many purposes properly regarded as one vessel. LORD KINGSDOWN's words in The Independence (1) (14 Moo.P.C.C. at p. 115) were that the tug "may for many purposes be considered as a part of the ship to which she is attached," and he went on to repeat the reason given in the earlier judgment reported in the same volume: The Cleadon (2), to which he was also a party, where it was said (14 Moo.P.C.C. at p. 97):

"The Cleadon being in tow of the tug, it is admitted she and the tug must be considered to be one ship, the motive power being in the tug and the governing power in the ship that was being towed."

I think the Flying Serpent and the Niobe may be so regarded for the purpose now in question. The principle on which the Niobe has been held liable for the collision seems to me to go far towards that conclusion. That the Niobe should be in tow from the Clyde to Cardiff or Penarth was, in the present case, part of the contract. I think the construction ought to be the same so far as relates to that voyage, as if the words in the margin had been "if the ship insured, while in tow between the Clyde and Cardiff or Penarth, shall come into collision with any other vessel," etc. If the contract had been so expressed, I should have thought it arbitrary and not reasonable to exclude a collision by the impact of the tug during that voyage upon another vessel, for the consequences of which the owners of the Niobe were liable. I am, for these reasons, of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from are right, and ought to be affirmed.

LORD WATSON stated the facts and continued: The legal liability of the Niobe, and the facts upon which it rests, as these were found by the President of the Admiralty Division, are matters of mutual admission in this case. Whether the collision between the Flying Serpent and the Valetta was a collision within the meaning of the marginal clause of the policy is the only subject-matter of controversy.

The clause is certainly not conceived in the terms in which one would have expected it to be if, as was argued, it was the intention of the parties to include in the indemnity all liabilities arising from collision which the Niobe could possibly incur. Under it the condition which must be fulfilled before any obligation can attach to the underwriters is "that the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with" another ship or vessel. These words in their literal sense import that there must be contact between the Niobe and such other ship or vessel, causing damage to the latter. There are many ways in which a ship under sail may, without being herself in collision, become liable to bear the whole damages resulting from a collision. Her unjustifiable manœuvre may occasion the colliding of two or more vessels, other than herself, without any blame on their part; and in that case the offending ship, and she alone, is responsible for the consequences of her fault. In such a case I should not be prepared to hold that the Niobe had, in the sense of the policy, "come into collision with" the vessels which she caused to collide, because there would be no ground in fact or law for the suggestion that the Niobe ought to be identified with any one of them.

So far as I can discover, none of the learned judges of the Court of Session indicated an opinion that the clause was so expressed as to cover every kind of liability for collision. They based their decision upon a special rule of law, which, it is admitted, has no application except as between a ship and her tug. They held that the identity which that rule establishes between tow and tug is so complete that the Niobe herself must be considered to have come into collision with the Valetta within the meaning of the policy. A sailing vessel and the steam-tug which has her in tow have frequently been described by eminent judges as, for certain purposes, constituting one ship—an expression which has been borrowed by text-writers, and is familiar to persons conversant with maritime law. The expression is figurative, and must not be strained beyond the meaning which the learned judges who have employed it intended that it should bear. As I understand their use of the expression, it signifies that the ship and her tug must be regarded as identical, in so far as the two vessels, with their connecting tackle, must be navigated as if they were one ship, and, the motive power being with the tug, must, in order to comply with the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, be steered and manœuvred as if they formed a single steamship; and also, in so far as the ship towed, when she has (as in this case) the control of the tug and the duty of directing the course of the tug in accordance with these regulations, is responsible for the natural consequences of the tug being wrongly steered through the neglect of her officers and crew to perform that duty.

There was, therefore, a legal connection between the Niobe and the Flying Serpent which could not subsist between her and any other vessel which her fault might drive into collision with a stranger ship. The Niobe was in contemplation of the law one and the same ship with the Flying Serpent for all purposes of their joint navigation with a view to avoid the risk of collision, and the fault which led to a collision between that legal composite and the Valetta was admittedly the fault not only of the Flying Serpent but of the Niobe. I admit the force of the appellant's argument that contracts ought to be construed according to the primary and natural meaning of the language in which the contracting parties have chosen to express the terms of their mutual agreement. But there are exceptions to the rule. One of these is to be found in the case where the context affords an interpretation different from the ordinary meaning of the words; and another in the case where their conventional meaning is not the same as their legal meaning. In the latter case the meaning to be attributed to the words of the contract must depend upon the consideration whether, in making it, the parties had or had not the law in their contemplation. The point thus raised appears to me to be a very narrow one. But in this case the contracting parties are shipowners and underwriters, and the clause in question relates to possible legal liabilities of the ship insured, which are entirely dependent upon the rules of maritime law. In these circumstances I have, not without some hesitation, come to the conclusion that they must be presumed to have known the law, and to have contracted on the faith of it.

LORD BRAMWELL stated the facts and continued: I say, then, in very fact the Niobe did not come into collision with the Valetta, causing a liability in the appellants, and, according to the ordinary primary meaning of the words used, the case is not within them. This is agreed. But it is said that for some reason the primary and natural meaning of the words is to be extended, and that we should hold that there was a collision where there was none. I am at a loss to see why.

I think that an Act of Parliament, an agreement, or other authoritative document, ought never to be dealt with in this way, unless for a cause amounting to a necessity, or approaching to it. It is to be remembered that the authors of the document could always have put in the necessary words if they had thought fit. If they did not, it was either because they thought of the matter and would not, or because they did not think of the matter. In neither case ought the court to do it. In the first case it would be to make a provision opposed to the intention of the framers of the document; in the other case, to make a provision not in the contemplation of those framers. Take this very case. Can anyone say that if the insured had required the insurers to agree to be liable for a collision by the tug (and be it remembered that it is mentioned that the Niobe was to be towed to

A Cardiff), I say if such a requirement had been made, can anyone say that the insurers would have agreed to it without an increase of premium—a liability for any towing till the voyage to Singapore was ended? Suppose a suit to reform the document by making the insurers liable for collisions by the tug, could it have succeeded?

B Let me examine the reasons given for adding to or altering the meaning of the words used. The Lord Ordinary says, if the collision clause is read in the strictest manner, he would be of opinion that the defender is not liable, but he thinks that it admits of being read in a broader and more comprehensive sense. The superlative "strictest" is a difficult word to deal with. Is it to be read in a way not strict; if so, how far short of it? His Lordship gives his reasons. He says:

C "The risk they wished and had an interest to cover was liability arising from collision for which, as owners of that particular ship, they might be liable . . . that the defender knew they wished to cover it, and it may fairly be presumed that the clause was intended to cover that particular risk."

D I respectfully ask: Where is the evidence that they wished to cover any risk of collision beyond what they have expressed, or that the defender knew that the pursuers so wished? I firmly believe that, if the truth were known, neither party had it in mind; and I repeat, I am by no means sure it would have been included for the same premium. The Lord Justice-Clerk says:

E "In certain circumstances the vessel is looked upon as being part of the tug, and the real question here is, whether that view applies to such a case as this. I think it would have been far better if the policy had been more clearly expressed."

F With submission, that should be not "more clearly" but "differently" expressed. Nothing can be clearer than it is. It is said that to hold as I do is a "narrow construction." I respectfully deny it. I do not "construe" the words; I simply read them, as I should "twice two are four." If too narrow is wrong, so is too wide, which, to my mind, the construction (for it is a construction) which I object to is. His Lordship came to the conclusion for the pursuer not without hesitation. LORD YOUNG says the collision was just the sort of collision, the possibility of which was contemplated by both sides. I should suppose, then, that he does not agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk that it would have been far better if the policy had been more clearly expressed. LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK doubts if the pursuer is

G right. LORD LEE agrees with the Lord Ordinary.

H It is said that the Niobe was, in the contemplation of the law, one and the same ship with the Flying Serpent for all purposes of their joint navigation with a view to avoid the risk of collision. I respectfully deny it. I deny that it is an intendment of the law. LORD KINGSDOWN, a most distinguished lawyer, did once use the unfortunate metaphor (judges ought to be very careful about using such expressions) that "the tug may for many purposes be considered as a part of the ship to which she is attached." He says "for many purposes," not for all. He does not say that it is to be considered that the plain words of a contract are to be misinterpreted. Had he foreseen what use would be made of his words he would not have used them. These two shall be one. And it is said that the parties to this suit knew all about this, and contracted on the footing of it. This seems to me to be a case (too

I common) in which there is a tendency to depart from the natural primary meaning of words, and add to or take from them, to hold that constructively words mean something different from what they say. It introduces uncertainty. No case is desperate when plain words may be disregarded. I deprecate this in all cases. In this particular one I believe it will be attended with at least this injustice, that the parties did not contemplate the case that has occurred, and perhaps would have raised the premium if they had. That they did not contemplate it I infer from the words they used. Ingenious cases were put in which there might be damage by collision with the Niobe without her touching the vessel damaged, as where she pushed an intermediate vessel against that damaged. I have no doubt that ingenuity might suggest many difficult cases. I content myself with dealing with the present, where the ship did not in any sense come into collision with any other ship and cause damage. I think the judgment should be reversed; but I suppose I must be in the wrong, because four judges of the Court of Session have held differently, and three of your Lordships, I know, will hold differently.

LORD MORRIS.—In my opinion the contract must be construed as an insurance against risk or liability for damage by collision to be incurred by the Niobe while in tow. What the owners were bargaining for was indemnity against loss or payment which the Niobe might incur by being towed. I consider the tug part of the apparatus for moving the ship Niobe, and that a collision by the tug while so towing the Niobe was a collision of the Niobe within the meaning of the marginal clause of the policy, and, consequently, that the judgment of the Court of Session should be affirmed.

LOW v. BOUVERIE

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.), May 1, 2, June 11, 1891]

Trustee—Duty of trustee—Preservation of trust fund—Payment of income and capital to cestuis que trust—Encumbrances on fund—Trustees' duty in answering inquiries from person proposing to lend money on interest of cestui que trust.

The duty of a trustee is properly to preserve the trust fund, to pay the income and the corpus to those who are entitled to them respectively, and to give all his cestuis que trust on demand information with respect to the mode in which the trust fund has been dealt with and where it is. But it is no part of the duty of a trustee to tell his cestui que trust what encumbrances he has created, nor which of his encumbrancers has given notice of their respective charges. It is no part of the duty of a trustee to assist his cestui que trust in selling or mortgaging his beneficial interest and in squandering or anticipating his fortune, and a person who proposes to buy or lend money on it has no greater rights than the cestui que trust himself. There is no trust or other relation between a trustee and a stranger about to deal with a cestui que trust, and although probably such a person, in making enquiries, may be regarded as authorised by the cestui que trust to make them, this view of the stranger's position will not give him a right to information which the cestui que trust himself is not entitled to demand. The trustee, therefore, is under no obligation to answer such an inquiry. He can refer the person making it to the cestui que trust himself. If, however, the trustee does answer the inquiry, what is the extent of his obligation? Is he bound to find out the facts; bound to make inquiries of his co-trustees, or of the solicitor to the trust?

A Or is his obligation limited to giving such information as he himself can give without inquiry or research? I am not aware of any principle or authority which imposes on him any obligation to do more than give an honest answer to the inquiry—that is to say, to do more than answer to the best of his actual knowledge and belief. There is no equitable as distinguished from legal obligation to answer such inquiries, and if a trustee gives an honest answer he discharges the only obligation which he is under: per LINDLEY, L.J.

B Slim v. Croucher (1) (1860), 1 De G. F. & J. 518, was overruled by Derry v. Peek (2) (1889), 14 App. Cas. 337; and Burrowes v. Lock (3) (1805), 10 Ves. 470, can only be sustained on the ground of estoppel.

C Trust—Fund—Encumbrance—Notice by encumbrancer to trustee—Priority over prior encumbrance not notified—Co-trustees not affected while ignorant of notice.

An encumbrancer of a trust fund who first gives notice to any of its trustees obtains priority over any prior encumbrancer who has given no notice to any of them; but notice to one does not affect the other trustees, so as to make them liable for what they may do in ignorance of the notice to their co-trustee: per LINDLEY, L.J.

D Notes. A trustee must now, subject to the payment of costs, produce written notices served on him in relation to an equitable interest in property to any person interested in the equitable: see s. 137 of the Law of Property Act, 1925 (20 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 427).

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of NORTH, J., in an action for a declaration. H

In January, 1888, Vice-Admiral Bouverie applied to the plaintiff, Robert Low, to lend him £600 on the security of his life interest in a sum of £5,523 6s. 3d. Metropolitan 3½ per cent. stock under the trusts of his marriage settlement, dated Sept. 1, 1845, and of certain policies of assurance on his life, and referred him to the defendant, H. H. P. Bouverie, who was one of the trustees of the settlement. On Feb. 22, 1888, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote as follows to the defendant: I

"We are doing business with Vice-Admiral Bouverie, and he says you will give us information as to his means and position. He says he is entitled to a life interest in some funds held in trust under a settlement dated Sept. 1, 1845, of which you are a trustee. Will you kindly tell us what those funds are, and whether Vice-Admiral Bouverie is still entitled to the full benefit of his life interest therein. We understand he has not in any way mortgaged or parted with such life interest. Is this so?"

A In answer to that letter the defendant wrote on Feb. 23 as follows :

"In reply to your letter of the 22nd inst., I beg to inform you that Vice-Admiral Bouverie has a life interest in £5,523 6s. 3d. Metropolitan 3½ per cent. stock, but this said life interest is charged with the payment of the premiums of two life policies, one of which amounts to £37 17s., and the other is extinct, also it is charged with payment of interest for money already advanced to him to the extent of £34 per annum."

On Feb. 25 the defendant wrote again :

"In furtherance of my letter to you of a day or two since, I beg to state that I hold a policy of insurance on Admiral Bouverie's life in Mutual Safety Assurance Society for £300, as security for the money advanced to him, for which the £34 mentioned to you is the annual charge of interest."

On the same day the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendant :

"Will you kindly inform us whether you hold any mortgage, or know of any encumbrance, upon Vice-Admiral Bouverie's life interest in the funds mentioned in your letter of the 23rd inst., or on his life interest under his marriage settlement. By so doing you will much oblige."

On Feb. 27, the defendant replied as follows :

"I don't see how I can explain myself more clearly than I did the other day in my letter to you. I hold no mortgage from Admiral Bouverie for the charge of interest on money advanced to him, but this charge of interest is in the ordinary course of business, but the two policies of insurance whose premiums now amount to £35 are mortgaged to his trustees."

Upon receipt of that letter, and without any further inquiry, the plaintiff advanced Vice-Admiral Bouverie the sum of £600 on the proposed security, and a deed of mortgage dated Mar. 1, 1888, was executed, of which notice was duly given to the defendant. Towards the end of 1888 Vice-Admiral Bouverie, being in pecuniary difficulties, left this country, and had not since returned. In April, 1889, the interest on the mortgage being in arrear, the plaintiff requested the defendant to pay him in future the balance of the income of the settled funds payable to Vice-Admiral Bouverie after satisfying the charges mentioned in the defendant's letters. It then appeared that Vice-Admiral Bouverie's life interest was charged with six prior mortgages, and that they were recited in the deed appointing the defendant a trustee of the settlement. In consequence of the prior encumbrances the plaintiff's security was worthless, and in order to keep up the policies mortgaged to him he had been obliged to pay the premiums. He, therefore, commenced this action claiming a declaration that the defendant was liable to pay him the £600 secured by the mortgage of Mar. 1, 1888, and also all the premiums paid by him together with interest thereon. The action was tried on admissions signed by both parties. The existence of the six prior mortgages was admitted, and that the defendant had notice of them, but that at the time he wrote the above-mentioned letters he had forgotten the existence of them. On Jan. 29, 1891, the case came before NORTH, J., who decided in favour of the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

June 11, 1891. The following judgments were read.

LINDLEY, L.J., after stating the facts: This appeal raises several extremely important questions. First it is necessary to consider what are the duties of trustees towards persons about to deal with their cestuis que trust, who, before dealing with them, make inquiries of their trustees as to any assignments or encumbrances known to them. In Browne v. Savage (4) KINDERSLEY, V.-C., said A (4 Drew. at p. 639) that trustees

"must for their own security give correct information when inquiry is made of them whether they have had notice of any prior assignments affecting their trust property."

MR. LEWIN, in his well-known work (LEWIN ON TRUSTS, 8th Edn., p. 704), refers B to this case as an authority for the proposition that trustees are bound to answer such inquiries. But when this opinion is examined it can scarcely be supported, and if such a doctrine were logically carried out it would impose very serious duties upon trustees. The duty of a trustee is properly to preserve the trust fund, to pay the income and the corpus to those who are entitled to them respectively, and to give all his cestui que trust on demand information with respect to the mode in C which the trust fund has been dealt with, and where it is. But it is no part of the duty of a trustee to tell his cestui que trust what encumbrances he has created, nor which of his encumbrancers have given notice of their respective charges. It is no part of the duty of a trustee to assist his cestui que trust in selling or mortgaging his beneficial interest and in squandering or anticipating his fortune; and it is clear that a person who proposes to buy or lend money on it has no greater rights than the cestui que trust himself. There is no trust or other relation D between a trustee and a stranger about to deal with a cestui que trust, and although probably such a person, in making inquiries, may be regarded as authorised by the cestui que trust to make them, this view of the stranger's position will not give him a right to information which the cestui que trust himself is not entitled to demand. The trustee, therefore, is, in my opinion, under no obligation to answer such an inquiry. He can refer the person making it to the cestui que trust himself. E

I will next take the case of a trustee who answers the inquiry. What in this case is the extent of his obligation? Is he bound to find out the facts; bound to make inquiries of his co-trustees, or of the solicitor to the trust? Or is his obligation limited to giving such information as he himself can give without inquiry or research? I am not aware of any principle or authority which imposes F upon him any obligation to do more than give an honest answer to the inquiry—that is to say, to do more than answer to the best of his actual knowledge and belief. He may, no doubt, undertake a greater responsibility; he may bind himself by a warranty, or he may so express himself as to be estopped from afterwards denying the truth of what he said; but unless he does one or the other I do not know on what principle consistent with Derry v. Peek (2) he can, if he answers G honestly, expose himself to liability. I say consistently with Derry v. Peek (2) because until that case was decided it was generally supposed to be settled in equity that liability was incurred by a person who carelessly, although honestly, made a false representation to another about to deal in a matter of business upon the faith of such representation: Burrowes v. Lock (3); Slim v. Croucher (1). This general proposition is, however, quite inconsistent with Derry v. Peek (2). H

I do not, however, understand Derry v. Peek (2) to apply where there is a legal obligation on the part of the defendant towards the plaintiff to give him correct information. If such an obligation exists, an action for damages will, I apprehend, lie for its non-performance, even in the absence of fraud: per LORD DENMAN in Barley v. Walford (5), 9 Q.B. at p. 208. It is for this reason that I have examined the obligation of trustees to answer inquiries made by persons about to deal with their cestui que trust. There is no equitable as distinguished from legal obligation I to answer such inquiries, and if a trustee gives an honest answer he discharges the only obligation which he is under. Again, Derry v. Peek (2) does not in any way affect the law relating to warranties, unless it be by negating the notion that promoters who issue a prospectus impliedly warrant the truth of the statements contained in it. Nor does Derry v. Peek (2) in any way affect the law relating to estoppel where such law is applicable. But estoppel is not a cause of action; it is

A a rule of evidence which precludes a person from denying the truth of some statement previously made by himself.

LORD HERSCHELL, in his opinion in Derry v. Peek (2), did not profess to overrule Burrowes v. Lock (3) and Slim v. Croucher (1), and it was strenuously contended that those cases were still law, and that they governed the present case. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine those cases with care. Burrowes v. Lock (3), as appears from the registrar's book, was a suit by the assignee of one of several residuary legatees for his share of the residue of a testator's estate. The amount of the residue was not in controversy, and a general administration decree was not sought. The defendants to the suit were plaintiff's assignor and the trustee of his share of the residue. The trustee had (as appears from the report in VESSEY) informed the plaintiff that this share was unencumbered, whereas, in fact, it was not. The decree was in effect that the trustee should pay the full amount of the share to the plaintiff without deducting the encumbrance. The trustee, even if he acted honestly, which is perhaps questionable, was clearly estopped from denying that the share was unencumbered. This decision was in 1805, more than thirty years before Pickard v. Sears (6), and at a time when the doctrine of estoppel was less accurately defined than it has since become. Regarded as a decision on the ground of estoppel, Burrowes v. Lock (3) appears to me not only to have been quite right, but to remain wholly untouched by Derry v. Peek (2). LORD BLACKBURN seems to have thought that the representation in Burrowes v. Lock (3) was scarcely distinguishable from a warranty: Brownlie v. Campbell (7), 5 App. Cas. at p. 953; and if this be the proper view to take of it Burrowes v. Lock (3) can stand on that ground, although I confess my own inability to sustain it on the ground of warranty.

Slim v. Croucher (1) in which Burrowes v. Lock (3) was recognised and extended, cannot, in my opinion, be supported on the ground of estoppel. It was a suit in equity to recover money advanced on a lease granted by the defendant to the borrower, which the defendant had told the plaintiff would be granted. The lease proved to be invalid. Unless the defendant's statement amounted to a warranty that the lease when granted would be valid, I do not myself see how to avoid the conclusion that Slim v. Croucher (3) is inconsistent with, and, therefore, overruled by, Derry v. Peek (2). LORD HERSCHELL, in his opinion, did not himself examine these cases, but intimated that the two might stand together upon the grounds explained by LORD SELBORNE in Brownlie v. Campbell (7) (5 App. Cas. at p. 935.) I am not, however, myself able to reconcile these grounds with the decision in Derry v. Peek (2). Slim v. Croucher (1) evidently proceeded upon the notion, sanctioned by the high authority of LORD CAMPBELL, that in that case an action for damages might have been maintained at law upon the defendant's representation, and that in such a case the Court of Chancery had a concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of common law. There would be no such jurisdiction in the case of a warranty. Slim v. Croucher (1) was not decided, nor did LORD SELBORNE approve of it, on any such ground (see 5 App. Cas. at p. 936). The only conclusion I can arrive at is that, while Burrowes v. Locke (3) can be supported and taken as a guide on the ground of estoppel or possibly fraud, Slim v. Croucher (1) cannot any longer be regarded as having been rightly decided, fraud having been negatived. As pointed out by LORD BLACKBURN in Brownlie v. Campbell (7) (5 App. Cas. at p. 953), the line between fraud and warranty is often very narrow, and the same observation is true of the line between warranty and estoppel. Narrow, however, as the line often is, the three words denote fundamentally different legal conceptions which must not be confounded.

Reverting now to the grounds of liability on which this action may be supported, it is obvious that as regards warranty the plaintiff and the defendant were not contracting parties. There was no intention to contract, nor was there any consideration which is essential for the purpose of treating what the defendant said as a promise or a warranty. As regards estoppel, if the defendant had said that there were no encumbrances on Admiral Bouverie's life interest except those mentioned by the defendant in his letters, the case would be clearly one of estoppel; it would be undistinguishable from Burrowes v. Lock (3); and the plaintiff would be entitled to relief, not to damages for a misrepresentation, but to an order on the defendant as trustee for the plaintiff to pay to him the Admiral's life interest in the fund in question, subject only to the encumbrances disclosed by the defendant. This is not the relief sought by the plaintiff, nor is it the relief given to him by the court below, but it is relief to which he would be entitled on the ground of estoppel. But the difficulty of affording the plaintiff relief on this ground arises from the ambiguity of the defendant's letters. They are quite consistent with the view that the encumbrances mentioned by the defendant were all he knew of or remembered. A statement, however, to that effect would not estop him from showing that there were others which he did not know of or did not remember.

But then it is said that he ought to have known of them and remembered them, as notice of them had been given to him; and it is admitted that, if he had looked into the deeds and documents relating to the trust, he would have found that there were other encumbrances besides those which he did in fact know of and did accordingly mention. Knowledge and means of knowledge are very different things; and if a person truly says he only knows or remembers so and so, is it right to treat him as saying that he knows more, even if it is his duty to inform himself accurately before he speaks? I do not think that so to hold would be consistent with Derry v. Peek (2). To treat him in the case supposed as saying more than he did would be to resuscitate the doctrine condemned in Derry v. Peek (2), and to hold him liable in damages for a negligent misrepresentation.

Then it is said that the defendant's language was such as to be calculated to mislead, and as in fact to mislead, the plaintiff's solicitors, who applied to the defendant for information, and reliance is placed on the judgment of PARKE, B., in Freeman v. Cooke (8), and of BRETT, J., in Carr v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (9). But the answer to this argument is that the plaintiff too hastily inferred from the defendant's letters that there were no other encumbrances besides those which he mentioned. He never said this in terms; I cannot think he meant so to be understood; and although the plaintiff's solicitors may have so understood him, I do not think they had more reason to be satisfied with his last letter than with his first, which they saw was too loosely expressed to justify them in acting upon it. It must be remembered that in this case the defendant was not the only trustee, and it does not appear that the plaintiff's advisers applied to the other trustee.

It is often said that notice to one trustee is notice to all: see Browne v. Savage (4); but this is one of those misleading generalities against which it is necessary to be on one's guard. An encumbrancer of a trust fund who first gives notice to any of its trustees obtains priority over any prior encumbrancer who has given no notice to any of them; but notice to one does not affect the other trustees so as to make them liable for what they may do in ignorance of the notice to their co-trustee. There is no law which precludes them from saying they do not know what he knows; and notice given to one who dies or retires without communicating it to his co-trustees cannot, I apprehend, render them liable for not giving effect to a notice of which they knew absolutely nothing: Phipps v. Lovegrove (10). The doctrine of implied notice cannot create an estoppel in such a case any more than it can create a personal liability.

Fraud, breach of duty, warranty, estoppel, being, therefore, negatived in the present case, no ground remains on which this action can be supported. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed with costs here and below.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I only add one or two words because substantially I agree with all LINDLEY, L.J., has said.

As to Derry v. Peek (2), I think, as we have already had reason more than once to explain, it decides two things, and two things only. First, the point of common

A law required no elaboration, namely, the point that an action for deceit or fraud, properly so called, would only lie at law for a fraudulent misrepresentation—a fraudulent allegation that a fact existed which did not exist, in the truth of which representation the person making it had no genuine or honest belief. That was the test rule at common law. But Derry v. Peck (2) decides, secondly, that in cases such as those of which that case was an instance, there is no duty enforceable at law to be careful in the representation which is made. Negligent misrepresentation does not certainly amount to deceit, and negligent misrepresentation can only amount to a cause of action if there exists a duty to be careful—not to give information, except after careful inquiry. In Derry v. Peck (2) the House of Lords considered that the circumstances raised no such duty. It is hardly necessary to point out that, if the duty is assumed to exist, there must be a remedy for its non-performance, and that, therefore, the doctrine that negligent misrepresentation affords no cause of action is confined to cases in which there is no duty such as the law recognises to be careful.

But Derry v. Peck (2) leaves, as LINDLEY, L.J., has said, altogether untouched, first of all, the case of warranty which we need not consider; secondly, cases of estoppel. But we must be guarded in the way in which we understand the remedy, where there is an estoppel. Estoppel is only a rule of evidence, you cannot found an action upon estoppel. Estoppel is only important as being one step in the progress towards relief, on the hypothesis that the defendant is estopped from denying the truth of something which he has said. An illustration of a case of that kind of estoppel filling up the gap in the evidence, which, when so filled up, would produce this right to relief, is found in Re Bahia and San Francisco Rail. Co. (11). Burrowes v. Lock (3) was a case of estoppel. It was a case where there was a right to relief on the hypothesis that the defendant was precluded from denying the truth of a particular fact. Slim v. Croucher (1) was supposed, by the court which decided it, to be on all-fours with Burrowes v. Lock (3), and so it would have been, I think, if an action for specific performance could have been brought in Slim v. Croucher (1). I confess that I agree with LINDLEY, L.J., in failing to discover how an action for specific performance could have laid in that case. If it could have laid, then I think the decision in Slim v. Croucher (1) could have been justified, because it seems to me that a person who alleges that he has undertaken to grant a lease really alleges that he has undertaken to grant a valid lease.

Therefore, we come to the conclusion in this case that, in order to entitle the plaintiff to relief, we must find here such an estoppel as would support a claim for relief, based upon the hypothesis that the defendant is precluded from denying the truth of the fact which he is supposed to have asserted. An estoppel, that is to say, the language upon which the estoppel is founded, must be precise and unambiguous. That does not necessarily mean that the language must be such that it cannot possibly be open to different constructions, but that it must be such as will reasonably be understood in a particular sense by the person to whom it is addressed. After a careful consideration of these letters, I have come to the conclusion that the defendant did not make any clear statement of the character which the plaintiff alleges. I think that his language would be reasonably understood as conveying an intimation of the state of his belief, without an assertion that the fact was so apart from the limitation of his own knowledge, and, therefore, that no relief here can be granted. The appeal, therefore, in my opinion must succeed.

KAY, L.J.—In the discussion in this case the question was raised whether courts of equity have been in the habit of exercising a more extensive jurisdiction than courts of law in cases of innocent misrepresentation.

The plaintiff being about to deal with an equitable tenant for life under a settlement by lending him money upon the security of his life interest, caused inquiries to be made of the defendant, who is one of the trustees of that settlement, whether the life estate was encumbered. If the defendant had given a positive answer that it was not encumbered, and the intending lender, relying upon that assurance, had proceeded to lend money upon a mortgage of the life interest and had afterwards taken proceedings against the trustee to realise his security, there seems to be no doubt that the trustee could not defend himself by saying that the life estate had been previously assigned, but that when he made the statement he had forgotten that fact. Also where there is conscious deceit there is no doubt that equity would give relief. A

In 1699, in Draper v. Borlace (12), one who had encouraged another to lend money on mortgage, concealing a prior charge of his own, was postponed. In 1801, in Evans v. Bicknell (13), LORD ELDON said (6 Ves. at p. 183): B

"It is a very old head of equity that, if a representation is made to another person, going to deal in a matter of interest upon the faith of that representation, the former shall make that representation good if he knows it to be false." C

Knowledge of the falsehood, of course, makes the representation fraudulent, and in cases of fraud courts of equity have always exercised a wide jurisdiction. The facts in Evans v. Bicknell (13) were that one Stansell, having a life interest in certain real estate in remainder after the death of his wife with a possible reversion in fee in default of children, obtained the title deeds from Bicknell, one of the trustees, and, concealing the settlement, mortgaged the estate in fee to the plaintiff, who filed the bill against the trustee, alleging that he had delivered the deeds to Stansell for the purpose of enabling him to make the mortgage. LORD ELDON said (ibid. at p. 182): D

"The question then is, supposing the husband's interest insufficient to satisfy the mortgage, whether there is a personal demand against Bicknell upon the circumstances of his conduct; and whether, if there is, it can be enforced in a court of equity." E

Relief was refused because the evidence of fraud was not sufficient.

In 1885, in Burrowes v. Lock (3), a trustee was held liable to the plaintiff who had bought the interest of a cestui que trust, relying upon the statement of the trustee that the cestui que trust was entitled to the fund, the trustee having forgotten that he had received notice of a prior encumbrance. The language of SIR WILLIAM GRANT seems to make it doubtful whether he entirely believed that the trustee had forgotten—if he had not, of course, his statement would be fraudulent. But it is quite plain that fraud is not necessary in all cases as a ground for this relief. F

In 1682, in Hobbs v. Norton (14), relief was given against the owner of land who answered an inquiry as to an annuity, supposed to be charged upon the land, that he believed it was so charged, and encouraged the applicant to proceed in his purchase of the annuity. The landowner was compelled to pay the annuity, though he had since discovered that he was entitled to the land free from any such charge. G

In 1690, in Hunsden v. Cheyney (15), a mother, who was entitled to a term of years in land which was limited to her in tail, stood by while her son negotiated a marriage upon the footing that he was entitled to the term upon her death, and engaged to settle such reversion on the issue of the marriage. On the suit of a child of that marriage she was compelled to make the settlement good, though it was insisted that she was not guilty of any fraud or ill-practice, but was ignorant that as tenant in tail she could dispose of the term. In each of these cases the plaintiff relied either upon the fraud of the defendant or upon his being estopped from defending himself by denying the truth of his own statement. H

In Slim v. Croucher (1) a person, being asked to lend upon the security of a lease which the borrower represented that he was entitled to have granted to him, applied to the lessor and received from him an assurance that he was agreeable to grant a peppercorn lease of the property in question to the borrower. In fact he had already granted the lease and the borrower had mortgaged it, but the lessor had forgotten the previous grant. The money having been advanced on the faith I

A of this statement, the Court of Appeal (consisting of LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., and KNIGHT BRUCE and TURNER, L.J.J.) directed the lessor to repay the money advanced with interest and costs of suit, recognising in distinct terms that there was no moral fraud on the part of the lessor. That case carries the doctrine as far as any that can be cited, because at that time courts of equity were not accustomed to give relief by way of damages in cases which did not involve actual fraud.

B LORD CAMPBELL said, however, that it belonged to a class of cases over which courts of law and courts of equity had a common jurisdiction, and the relief was granted on the authority of the dicta of LORD ELDON in Evans v. Bicknell (13), and upon the ground that the plaintiff was to be placed as far as possible in the position he was in before the representation was made. According to the recent decision in the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek (2), an action of deceit could not have

C been maintained under such circumstances, because there was not actual fraud. The doctrine of estoppel seems scarcely applicable.

The representation relied on in Slim v. Croucher (1) was more like a contract or promise than the statement of an existing fact. The lessor said he was agreeable to grant the lease, but, as the money was not advanced at the lessor's request, there seems to be no consideration to support a contract. However, the language

D used by the lessor involved a representation that he was in a position to grant the lease, and this may have been the misrepresentation relied on. If the mortgagee could sue the landlord to compel him to grant the lease, or in the alternative for damages, and the landlord were estopped from denying his ability to make the grant, he might be treated as contumaciously refusing to do so, and in this way, perhaps, the decision might be justified. But this would be an action

E for specific performance of a contract, and I do not see how it could be maintained. TURNER, L.J., says distinctly that enforcing a personal demand against the defendant under such circumstances is an old jurisdiction of the Court of Equity, and refers to LORD ELDON's language in Evans v. Bicknell (13), which, however, as I have pointed out, was a case of fraud. LORD CAMPBELL evidently felt the difficulty, for in his judgment he seems to distinguish the case from an action for damages,

F because there could be no question about the amount to be recovered.

In Piggott v. Stratton (16) a vendor induced a man to buy land for building by a statement that he was lessee of the adjoining land, and could not, owing to the terms of his lease, build upon it so as to obstruct the sea view from the land he was selling. After the plaintiff had built the vendor surrendered his lease and took a new one not containing any restriction against obstructing the view, and

G then commenced to build so as to obstruct the view from the plaintiff's houses. It was held by the same court that decided Slim v. Croucher (1) that the vendor must be restrained from so doing, LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., sustaining the injunction expressly on the ground of estoppel. He said (1 De G.F. & J. at p. 49):

"I apprehend that the injunction is to be supported on the well-established doctrine that, if A. deliberately makes an assertion to B. intending it to be acted upon by B. and it is acted upon by B., A. is estopped from saying that it was not true. If it turns out to be false, A. is answerable for the damage which may have accrued to B. from having acted upon it, and B. is entitled, in respect of anything done in the belief that it was true, to object to any denial of its truth by A. This doctrine is to be found in Pickard v. Sears (6) and a series of subsequent decisions."

I LORD CAMPBELL's language in both these cases, but more especially in the former, might be read as intimating an opinion that an action at law would lie for an innocent misrepresentation of fact upon which another person acted. But Piggott v. Stratton (16) was an obvious case of estoppel.

It has been recognised since Freeman v. Cooke (8) that a statement made by a man with the intention that it should be acted upon, and which is acted upon accordingly, is binding upon him, so that he is precluded from contesting its truth, although it was not fraudulently made, and this has been followed in numerous instances. The doctrine was stated by LORD BLACKBURN in the House of Lords, in the well-known case of Burkinshaw v. Nicolls (17) in these words (3 App. Cas. at p. 1026):

"When a person makes to another the representation, 'I take upon myself to say such and such things do exist, and you may act upon the basis that they do exist,' and the other man does really act upon that basis, it seems to me that it is of the very essence of justice that between those two parties their rights should be regulated, not by the real state of the facts, but by that conventional state of facts which the two parties agree to make the basis of their action."

Certificates in that case had been issued by a joint-stock company for shares which the certificates stated had been fully paid up, and the company were held to be estopped from denying that they were paid up as against a purchaser of those shares for value without notice. The same doctrine was applied in Re Bahia and San Francisco Rail. Co. (11) and in Hart v. Frontino and Bolivia South American Gold Mining Co. (18), where no kind of fraud was imputed to the companies.

The result of the authorities seems to be as follows: (i) There has been from ancient times a jurisdiction in courts of equity in certain cases to enforce a personal demand against one who made an untrue representation, upon which he knew that the person to whom it was made intended to act, if such person did act on the faith of it and suffered loss by so acting. (ii) This was readily done where the representation was fraudulently made, in which case an action of deceit would lie at law. (iii) Relief will also be given at law and in equity, even though the representation was innocently made, without fraud, in all cases where the suit will be effective if the defendant is estopped from denying the truth of his representation. (iv) Where there is no estoppel, an innocent misrepresentation will not support an action at law for damages occasioned thereby. (v) Estoppel is effective where an action must succeed or fail if the plaintiff or defendant is prevented from disputing a particular fact alleged. For example, if an assign of A. sues A.'s trustees to recover the fund assigned, and the trustee is prevented from denying its existence in his hands, or at law, if the assign of a debt should sue the alleged debtor, and he was prevented from denying that the debt was due; or, in the converse case, an estoppel may be a defence, as if a joint-stock company were to sue a shareholder for calls, and they were estopped from denying that the shares were paid up, their action would fail. It is obvious that this rule does not apply to an action for deceit. In such an action the plaintiff relies not on the truth of the statement, but upon its falsehood, and he is bound to prove not only that the representation was untrue, but also that it was made fraudulently. Derry v. Peek (2) very well illustrates the difference. It was an action by a person who had been induced to take shares in a joint-stock company by an untrue statement in a prospectus. The action was not against the company, but against the directors who had issued the prospectus. The representation was not fraudulently made. Preventing the defendants from denying the truth of their representation would not enable the plaintiff to succeed in such an action, so that the plaintiff could not rely on estoppel. That would only be if the defence had been that the statement was inaccurate, and the defendants were estopped from denying the accuracy of their own statement. The plaintiff's case was not that the statement must be treated as accurate; on that supposition he could not have had any relief against the defendants. The plaintiff sued the defendants upon the ground that the statement was false, and false to their knowledge, that is fraudulent; and the defence that prevailed was, that if it was inaccurate, it was not fraudulent. (vi) I am not satisfied that relief in the nature of a personal demand against the defendant has been given in equity in cases which did not involve fraud, or to which the doctrine of estoppel would not apply. Slim v. Croucher (1) is the only instance I know of, and, as LORD CAMPBELL said, there might be relief at law

A in that case; he probably considered, either that it was a case of estoppel, or that an action of deceit would lie, which latter view is not consistent with Derry v. Peek (2).

In the present case the doctrine of estoppel would enable the plaintiff to succeed if the facts warrant the application of it. But, in order to create an estoppel, the statement by which the defendant is held bound must be clear and unambiguous.

B This is an ancient rule as to estoppel by statements in a deed, as appears from ROLLE'S ABRIDGMENT, "Estoppel," (P.), pl. 1 and 7, and was acted on by LOHN CAIRNS in Heath v. Crealock (19). In General Finance Mortgage and Discount Co. v. Liberator Permanent Building Society (20) SIR GEORGE JESSEL followed the last case, and intimated that in his opinion the doctrine ought not to be extended, there being no reasons for preferring one innocent purchaser to another. That
C certainty of statement is also required to maintain an estoppel upon a statement not by deed, appears from Freeman v. Cooke (8), where relief was refused upon the ground that no reasonable man would have acted on the faith of the statements made if they were taken altogether. Whether this suit be treated as in equity or at law, the essence of the plaintiff's case must be that he was misled by the statement. The court must be satisfied of this. If there was fraud and the D statement was intended to mislead, its ambiguity would not be a defence. But where no fraud is alleged it is essential to show that the statement was of such a nature that it would have misled any reasonable man, and that the plaintiff was in fact misled by it.

One peculiarity of the present case is that there is no evidence. The cause is tried upon admissions by both sides. Consequently, we have no statement by the
E plaintiff or by his professional advisers, who were the real actors in the negotiations, as to what meaning they attributed to the letters on which they now rely as a misrepresentation; nor is there any statement or admission as to the extent of the reliance which they placed upon the alleged misrepresentation. The court has to determine what the representation amounted to, and how far it influenced the plaintiff's conduct. The plaintiff did not personally interfere in the negotia-
F tions. His solicitors having been applied to by Vice-Admiral Bouverie, the equitable tenant for life, for a loan upon the security of his life interest, and having, as appears from the first letter, been assured by him that he had not mortgaged or in any way parted with such life interest, wrote the letters which have been read. It was pointed out by BOWEN, L.J., in the argument that the last letter but one demonstrated that the writers, the plaintiff's solicitors, considered
G they had not obtained at that time a satisfactory answer to the question stated in it. The reply was on Feb. 27. Without further inquiry the plaintiff lent money to Vice-Admiral Bouverie upon the security of a mortgage of his life interest. The plaintiff admits that the defendant did not, at the time of his correspondence, recollect that he had received, as he now admits was the fact, notice of, or that he was otherwise aware of the existence of, previous mortgages on the life estate.

H It appears that nothing can be recovered from the tenant for life, who is an undischarged bankrupt, and is out of the jurisdiction.

What is the true inference from these facts? Did this correspondence amount to a statement by the defendant that there were no other encumbrances upon the life estate than those mentioned in his letters? Or was the true meaning that those were all that he knew of or remembered at the time? It is said that we
I should adopt the former view, because otherwise it is not probable that the money would have been advanced; but I am not convinced of that. The plaintiff's solicitors had the assurance of Vice-Admiral Bouverie that he had not encumbered, and they might have well been satisfied with the statement of the trustee in addition that he did not know of any encumbrance. Such a statement made in good faith, if accurate, would not render the defendant liable. I am strongly disinclined, in a case which is free from suspicion of fraud, to hold a person in the position of this defendant liable upon a statement which is not clear and unambiguous. I cannot believe that solicitors receiving such letters as those written by this defendant could possibly read them as a positive assurance that there were no other encumbrances. I think that the only fair meaning which they could attribute to the statements of the defendant was, that the charges he mentioned were all that he was aware of at the time he was writing. For this reason I think that the appeal should be allowed and the action dismissed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

Shipping—Salvage—Award—Enforcement—Action in rem—Appearance by defendants—Sum awarded greater than sum claimed and amount for which bail given and costs.

Where, in a salvage action in rem in the Admiralty Court, the defendants, the owners of the ship and cargo, appear as such, and the court amends the writ and awards a sum larger than that claimed, execution can be issued for the sum awarded although it is greater than that originally claimed and greater than the amount for which bail has been given and costs.

In a salvage action in rem claiming £5,000, the defendants' solicitors gave a written undertaking to appear and to put in bail in an amount not exceeding £5,000. The court awarded £7,500, and subsequently ordered the endorsement on the writ to be amended by altering the claim from £5,000 to £8,500. The plaintiffs were allowed to issue execution against the defendants personally for the amount of the award, and were not restricted to the amount originally claimed and named in the undertaking to put in bail.

May 10, 1892. JEUNE, J., read the following judgment.—In this case, which is an action in rem of salvage, the claim on the writ was for £5,000. The owners of the ship and cargo appeared as such, and by consent the ship was released on bail for £5,000 being given. At the hearing on Nov. 26, 1891, before the President, the salvage was fixed at £7,500. On Dec. 16, the writ was amended by order of the President by increasing the amount claimed to £8,500. On Mar. 10, 1892, the Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of this court as to the amount of the salvage award. The motion came before me on an application that particulars may be given of the names and addresses of the owners of the Dictator, the salved ship, and her cargo, with the value of the cargo belonging to such cargo-owner opposite to his name. But it was agreed that the real object of the resistance to the application is to try the question whether execution can be issued against the owners of the ship and cargo for more than £5,000 and costs. C D E

If this had been an action in personam, as it might have been (Five Steel Barges (1)), no doubt execution could be levied for the full amount of the award, it being within the value of the property salved. But it is an action in rem, and the contention is, that in such action, even when the owners of the res appear, there cannot be execution for any greater amount than that originally claimed, or at least, than the amount for which bail has been given and costs. The question, therefore, is, what—when the owners of the res have appeared in a salvage action in rem—is the limitation (other than the value of the property salved) on the powers of the court to award salvage, or the power of the plaintiff to enforce its payment if awarded. It is necessary to consider first whether in an action in rem, where a personal action would lie against the owners, judgment can be enforced for more than the value of the res, because, if it can, no doubt it can be enforced for more than the amount of the bail. In a salvage action in rem the question so stated has probably seldom arisen, although The Jonge Bastiaan (2) is an instance of it, because the property salved is generally identical with the res, and the salvage award never goes beyond the value of the property salved. But in actions of damage the question may readily arise, now that the limit of liability may exceed the value of the ship by which the damage was caused and probably arose before the limit of the value of the ship was imposed by statute, as to the limit of the amount to be recovered. It is one upon which the highest authorities are in conflict, and I think it can be solved only by considering the practice, and especially the early practice of the Admiralty Court and the different views which at different times have been taken of the effect of an action in rem. F G H I

There can, I think, be no doubt that the courts of common law always clearly drew the distinction between the case of the Court of Admiralty having jurisdiction by reason of hypothecation or lien, or other reason, over a res, and it seeking to exercise jurisdiction against individuals personally, with regard to whom no such jurisdiction in the view of the common law courts existed, and while they allowed the action to proceed in regard to the former matter, prohibited it as to the latter (Johnson v. Shippen (3) approved by BLACKBURN, J., in

A Castrique v. Imrie (4)), and probably the Court of Admiralty, in cases such as The Ruby Queen (5) recognised that the court might have jurisdiction quoad the res, though not quoad its owners. But the Court of Admiralty, it would appear, did not in early times treat the action in rem as a specific and distinct form of action. If we turn to the PRAXIS CURIÆ ADMIRALITATIS OF CLERKE whom LORD HARDWICKE described (1 Atk. at p. 296) as "an author of undoubted credit," and select an edition published in the middle of the last century (I take that of SIMPSON, published in 1743), we find a complete sketch of the procedure and causes in the Court of Admiralty in force at that time, and probably for a long period before. In all actions in that court the respondent, if he appeared (tit. 12), had to find bail for the amount in which the action was instituted, or go to prison, and then the action proceeded against him in personam, and if judgment went against him he was monished to pay the amount ordered (tit. 63), or if he failed to do so his bail (tits. 64, 65), the consequence of default being attachment (tits. 67, 68). If he did not appear (tit. 28) his appearance could be enforced by seizure of any ship or any goods belonging or supposed to belong to him within the Admiralty jurisdiction, the real owner being able to intervene and claim them. If after such seizure he appeared and gave bail (tit. 37) the ship or goods were delivered over to him, and the case proceeded ut in actione instituta contra personam debitoris.

It would seem clear that the arrest in such cases was not limited to any particular property of the defendant on the seas; that the object of the arrest was to secure appearance and bail or provide a fund for securing compliance with the judgment, and that, whatever was the value of the property or the amount of the bail, the defendant would be liable to pay and liable to be attached if he did not pay the full amount of the sum decreed against him. No doubt the main object of arrest, whether of person or property, was to secure that bail should be given to satisfy the judgment. In RIDLEY'S VIEW OF THE CIVIL AND ECCLESIASTICAL LAW, published in 1639, the author writes (3rd Edn.), p. 94 :

"The proceeding in all these civil matters is by libel concluding to the action, the party agent giving caution to prosecute the suite and to pay what shall be adjudged against him if he faile in the suite; the defendant on the contrary part securing his adversarie by sufficient suretie or other caution as shall seeme meet for the present to the judge that he will appeare in judgment and will pay that which shall be adjudged against him, and that he will satisfie and allow all that his proctor shall doe in his name: for to all these ends satisfaction (or security) in judgment is, which is nothing else but a course to secure the adversary of that which is in debate before the judge, that on what side soever the cause shall have an end, the clients may be seen to get that which by law shall be adjudged unto them."

A similar view of the action in the Admiralty courts is to be gathered from H GODOLPHIN, writing towards the end of the seventeenth century. In enumerating the modes of procedure he speaks (GODOLPHIN'S ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION (1685), p. 41) of arrest of property only as a means to compel appearance. Similarly the table of fees at the end of SPELMAN'S treatise (DISCOURSE OF THE ADMIRAL JURISDICTION AND THE OFFICERS THEREOF) left by him at his death in 1641 contains the item "Pro relaxatione navis aut bonorum ab arresto," which I think refers I not merely to ship and cargo, but to any property of the defendant. And that the action in rem was not then regarded by Admiralty practitioners as a peculiarity existing in Admiralty procedure seems to me clear from the fact that PRYNNE in 1669, in his answers to LORD COKE'S ARTICULI ADMIRALITATIS, while enumerating the advantages which that procedure possessed over the common law, makes no mention of any such special form of action. It would appear, therefore, that under the earlier practice the distinction between actions in personam and actions in rem depended on whether the person or the property of the defendant was arrested in the first instance, but if the defendant appeared the procedure and effect of an action in rem became those of an action in personam. A

But several changes in law or practice took place.

When actions beginning by arrest of the person became obsolete in the last century, as DR. LUSHINGTON, in The Clara (6) (Sw. at p. 3), says they did, the last being in 1780, and the arrest of the property other than the res to compel appearance, which must always have been unusual, became obsolete also, the result was that the only action beginning by arrest at all was one beginning by B arrest of the res, though in theory arrest of the person would still seem permissible (per FRY, L.J., in The Heinrich Björn (7), 10 P.D. at pp. 53, 54). On the other hand, arrest of property over which a lien could be enforced became more common as the idea of a pre-existing maritime lien developed, and arrest of property, in order to arrest for the creditor that legal nexus over the proprietary interest of his debtor as from the date of the attachment of which LORD WATSON speaks in The C
Heinrich Björn (7) grew up. The result was, that arrest became the distinctive feature of the action in rem, such arrest having primarily for its object the satisfaction of the creditor out of the property seized.

But there seems no reason to suppose that the action beginning by arrest of the res altered the course or character it had hitherto assumed as to the appearance of the debtor in it; and, if that be so, it would seem clear that the full amount of D a judgment—if a defendant who might himself have been arrested appeared—could be enforced by the only means available in the Admiralty Court, monition and attachment (The Victor (8)), whatever the value of the property arrested. Nor when we come to a later period can it, I think, be doubted that the view of a defendant's liability, which I have endeavoured to express, was the view of LORD STOWELL. In The Dundee (9), decided in 1823, LORD STOWELL said E (1 Hag. Adm. at pp. 120, 121, 124):

"The quantum or reparation due in such cases [cases of damage] has been differently measured in the maritime laws of different commercial countries, and of the same commercial country, among others our own, at different periods. The ancient general law exacted a full compensation out of all the property of the owners of the guilty ship upon the common principle F applying to persons undertaking the conveyance of goods, that they were answerable for the conduct of the persons whom they employed, and of whom the other parties who suffered damage knew nothing, and over whom they had no control. To this rule our own country conformed.... It is an admitted fact that this mode of initiating a suit by arrest of ship, tackle, apparel and furniture, is the ancient formula of the court, though leading to a full remedy affecting all the property of every kind belonging to the owners. The same formula has existed and operated its remedy under all the variations by which the remedy has been modified. It has been no further restricted than as the statutes restrict it. But the initiatory terms, tackle, apparel and furniture, founded the suit sufficiently to embrace all the objects which the statutes left subject to its operation. These restrained H them only by their own particular restrictions. The same words went as far as the general law went, notwithstanding the narrowness of those terms, and they must now go as far as the general law, limited only by that statute, extends."

There can, I think, be no doubt from these words what was the view of I
LORD STOWELL. In Stoomvaart Maatschappij Nederland v. Peninsular and Oriental Navigation Co. (10), LORD BLACKBURN, after quoting them, says (7 App. Cas. at pp. 813, 814):

"LORD STOWELL treats it as quite clear that, though the mode in which the Court of Admiralty founded its jurisdiction was by seizure of the ship, the recompense in damages decreed by that court could be enforced against the owners out of all their property of every kind, so that the result was that by the general law the owners might be made to pay to their uttermost

A farthing the recompense in damages decreed by the Court of Admiralty, however small the value of their ship, when seized, was. PARKE, B., in Brown v. Wilkinson (11) (15 M. & W. at p. 398), says: 'From the practice of the Court of Admiralty no light could be derived on this question, for that court proceeds in rem, and can only obtain jurisdiction by seizure and the value, when seized, is the measure of liability.' It is not, I think, necessary to decide between those very high authorities. If it were, I should wish to make further search among the cases on prohibition. But prima facie, one would say, LORD STOWELL was more familiar with the subject, and, therefore, more likely to be accurate."

C It is unfortunately now necessary to decide between these high authorities to which LORD BLACKBURN refers. I am not quite sure that prohibition affords a complete test, because, given the liability of the owner to make full compensation to be enforced by the Court of Admiralty, the rest seems to be a question not of jurisdiction but of procedure; but, if prohibition be the test in this case it certainly supports LORD STOWELL's view. Although, as I have said, prohibition was granted as to the owners when the Court of Admiralty proceeded against them having jurisdiction to proceed only against the res, I cannot discover any prohibitions to the Admiralty Court either for proceeding against res and owners where there was a jurisdiction against the owner personally, or for issuing attachment against owners to enforce payment of an amount exceeding the value of the res, and certainly no trace of any such appears in the ARTICULI ADMIRALITATIS or in the REPLIES TO LORD COKE'S OPINIONS where one would have expected to find it. I would further remark that, though The Dundee (9) was referred to in Brown v. Wilkinson (11), attention does not appear to have been drawn in argument to the Admiralty practice. The dicta of PARKE, B., are mistaken in asserting that the Court of Admiralty can obtain jurisdiction only by seizure, and appear altogether to ignore the Admiralty jurisdiction in personam. There can be no doubt that DR. LUSHINGTON's opinion expressed in The Volant (12) (1 Wm. Rob. at p. 388) that

F "the jurisdiction of this court does not depend on the existence of the ship, but on the origin of the question to be decided and the locality,"

G correctly represents the law: see per STORY, J., in De Lovio v. Boit (13) (2 Gallison, at pp. 461, 464). The view of SIR JOHN NICOLL was, I think, in harmony with that of LORD STOWELL. In The Triune (14), which was an action for damage by collision against the master who was also part owner, the value of the ship arrested falling short of the damage which was assessed at £400, SIR JOHN NICOLL, treating the defendant as master and so not protected by s. 1 of the [repealed] statute 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, [relating to the responsibilities of shipowners], monished him to pay that sum of £400 and, failing to do so he was imprisoned.

H The argument before me turned chiefly on the decisions of DR. LUSHINGTON. It must, I think, be admitted that they are not consistent, and it is this inconsistency that has necessitated a more general view of the subject than would otherwise have been necessary, but, in view of the authorities I have referred to, I am, I think, justified in giving the preponderance to those expressions of his opinion which support them, and I think it will also be found that the earliest and latest views of DR. LUSHINGTON seem in harmony with those of LORD STOWELL and SIR JOHN NICOLL. In The Aline (15), decided in 1839, DR. LUSHINGTON said (1 Wm. Rob. at pp. 116, 117):

"Independent of any municipal regulation, it is, I apprehend one of the great principles of justice that in cases of this description, where the wrong is done by the servants of the owner, the owner ought to make good the whole loss occasioned by their default. In the courts of common law, where the proceedings are in personam, the operation of this principle would be carried out in its fullest extent, unless restrained by Act of Parliament. In these courts, however, when the proceedings are in rem, a mode of remedy not originally given as the measure of the damage, but as the best security for indemnity that could be obtained as the owner might be beyond the reach of the law, the application of this principle has been modified by municipal regulation, and a restriction is imposed [not, DR. LUSHINGTON says, by the nature of the action, but by] limiting the liability of the owner of the ship doing the damage to the value of the vessel itself, and of the freight where the freight can be attached. Under this modification, therefore, the rights of a person in possession of a decree of this court in a cause of damage are co-extensive with the rights of the owner in the vessel against which the decree has been awarded."

This is almost an echo of the words of LORD STOWELL. I do not think that The Hope (16), decided in 1840, asserts any contrary principle. It decided that the owners of a ship having been sued as owners and so entitled to avail themselves of the protection of the statute (53 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 1), judgment could not be obtained against the master who was also a part owner beyond the value of the res; and so far it perhaps differed from The Triune (14), which was not cited in argument. But, although DR. LUSHINGTON said that he was not aware of any case in which the court in a proceeding of that kind had ever had engrafted upon it a further proceeding against the owners upon the ground that the proceeds of the vessel proceeded against have been insufficient to answer the full amount of damages pronounced for, this falls short of saying that apart from the statute the owners were not liable in an action in rem for damages beyond the value of the res.

In The Volant (12), decided in 1842, it cannot be doubted that DR. LUSHINGTON departed from the view of LORD STOWELL, basing his opinion on this very inference from the style of the court which LORD STOWELL had deprecated. He said (1 Wm. Rob. at pp. 388, 389) :

"In a case in which the owner has appeared the question is to what extent he has appeared to the process against the ship. It is material to see how the process is worded. It decrees the ship to be seized, and it cites all persons having, or pretending to have, any right, title, or interest therein to appear in this court on certain days and hours, there to answer in a cause civil and maritime. The owners are only called in respect to any right, title, and interest, in order that they may appear and intervene for their interest in the vessel and not further. Now, if it were possible on such warrant to demand bail beyond the value of the ship, or if the process against the owners went to make them responsible beyond the value of the ship, there could be no reason why bail should not be commensurate with the damage where the amount is not restricted by statute; but, if bail could not be demanded beyond the value of the ship, I do not see how the owners in that proceeding can be made further responsible; the warrant of arrest is confined to the ship, it goes no further. It appears to me therefore that there is no personal liability beyond the value of the ship, for this obvious reason, that the original process would not justify any such proceeding; the appearance given by the individual himself would not justify such proceeding; he has appeared only to protect his interest in the ship."

It is true that it was not necessary for the decision of this case to say more than DR. LUSHINGTON said later in his judgment, that to render a master who was part owner guilty of neglect, responsible beyond the value of ship and freight he must be sued as master in the first instance. It is true also that in a later case, The Temiscouata (17), (2 Ecc. & Ad. at p. 210), DR. LUSHINGTON places his decision on the restriction of liability effected by the Acts of Parliament, and not by the nature of an action in rem; and he seems to explain his decision in The Volant (12) very much as he had expressed himself in The Aline (15); but I do not think that on those grounds we can refuse to acknowledge

A the weight of Dr. LUSHINGTON's opinion expressed in the words I have quoted.

A similar expression of opinion is to be found in The Kalamazoo (18). Again, the actual decision is not in point, because all that was decided was that a ship having been released on bail could not be re-arrested in a further action where the compensation found due exceeded the bail. But Dr. LUSHINGTON took occasion to say (15 Jur. at p. 886):

B "It is said that the party ought to receive the whole amount of the damage done to the full extent of the value of the ship in fault. To this there are two answers. First, it was their own fault if they did not arrest her to the full value of the ship; and secondly, there is no authority to show that, having obtained bail for the ship, you can afterwards proceed against the owners to make up the amount of the loss. I cannot think I can engraft a personal action upon an action in rem."

C But in The Zephyr (19), decided in 1864, Dr. LUSHINGTON gave a decision, the reason for which appears to me not in accordance with his view as expressed in The Volant (12) and the Kalamazoo (18), and which, if correct, is conclusive in favour of the present application. The action for damage in that case was entered for £700 and the Zephyr was arrested. The liability of the owners under s. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862 [repealed], was £712, and exceeded the value, £400, of the ship for which bail was given. The application made was to amend the præcipe by inserting the names of the owners and for a citation in personam against them. Dr. LUSHINGTON refused the application on the express ground that it was unnecessary. He said (11 E L.T. at p. 351):

F "I have only known of one instance in which a personal action has been engrafted on a suit in rem. There is some difficulty in altering the præcipe as prayed, and such a course appears to the court unnecessary, inasmuch as s. 15 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861 [section repealed], gives the court power to effect the object with which the motion has been made. That section puts decrees of the Court of Admiralty upon the same footing as judgments in the Superior Courts of common law, and gives a remedy as well against the ship and goods arrested as against the person of the judgment creditor. If, therefore, the occasion should arise, a monition might issue to compel the owners of the Zephyr to pay the amount of damages not covered by the bail bond."

G I confess I am unable to attribute to s. 15 of the Act of 1861, the effect which Dr. LUSHINGTON is reported to give to it. It seems to me only to arm the Court of Admiralty, which then could only enforce its orders for payment by attachment, with the same powers of execution as were possessed by the Superior Courts; and if the objection to proceeding against the owners in that action H for any sum over £400 really depended on its being impossible to graft an action in personam on an action in rem (the phrase employed by Dr. LUSHINGTON in The Hope (16) and The Kalamazoo (18), and in argument in The Victor (8) it appears to me that that objection would equally apply whether the proceeding was by way of fi. fa. or by way of monition and attachment. I cannot help thinking that the fallacy lies in considering that to enforce a judgment beyond I the value of the res against owners who have appeared, and against whom a personal liability enforceable by Admiralty process exists, is the grafting of one form of action on another. The change, if it be a change, in the action is effected at an earlier stage, viz., when the defendant, by appearing personally, introduces his personal liability. It appears to me that the meaning of Lord STOWELL's opinion, as above quoted, is that the judgment can be so enforced in the action in which the ship is arrested, and that in The Zephyr (19) Dr. LUSHINGTON really intended to follow that opinion, and to adhere to his own opinion in The Aline (15).

I do not think that the opinion of the Privy Council in The Bold Buccleuch (20) militates against this view. In that case the Privy Council, disapproving the decision of DR. LUSHINGTON in The Volant (12) and The Johann Friederich (21), that the arrest of the res operated only to compel appearance in a manner analogous to the procedure in foreign attachment, and to furnish security for prompt and immediate payment, and also the decision in The Aline (15) that a lien attached only upon action brought, held that a maritime lien attached from the time of damage done, that a maritime lien was the foundation of proceeding in rem, and that an action in rem was a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attached. In The Parlement Belge (22) it was said that The Bold Buccleuch (20) decided that "the action in rem is a different action from the action in personam, and has different results." But I do not think that it follows on that that the Privy Council or the Court of Appeal intended to lay down that an action in rem could affect only the res. It may well be that, if the owners do not appear, the action only enforces the lien on the res; but that when they do the action in rem not only determines the amount of the liability, and in default of payment enforces it on the res, but is also a means of enforcing against the appearing owners, if they could have been made personally liable in the Admiralty Court, the complete claim of the plaintiff so far as the owners are liable to meet it.

It appears to me consonant with common sense that, if the owners have had no personal notice, and are not, save in the sense indicated in The Parlement Belge (22), before the court, the effect of its judgment should be limited to the res in its hands; but that, if the owners appear to contest or reduce their liability, they should be placed in the same position as if they had been brought before the court by a personal notice. It was argued by counsel for the defendants that the fact that a mortgagee is entitled to appear shows that appearance is limited to the interest in the res, but a mortgagee has no interest in or connection with the action beyond his interest in the res, nor can he by any process be fixed with any further liability. It was admitted in argument that an owner, by appearing, renders himself liable to costs over and above the value of the res. It is clear, however, that the authorities which decide that this liability for costs undoubtedly exists distinguish between that and liability for damages: The John Dunn (23); The Volant (12); The Temiscouata (17); The Freedom (24). I do not forget that modern text-writers (WILLIAMS AND BRUCE'S ADMIRALTY PRACTICE (2nd Edn.), pp. 81, 82, 302) have adopted the view that the remedy afforded by proceedings in rem cannot extend beyond the property proceeded against. But it appears to me that the point was not specially considered, and that the opinion expressed proceeded chiefly, if not entirely, on the decisions in The Hope (16), The Volant (12), and The Kalamazoo (18).

Even if, however, it be held that the remedy in actions in rem is limited by the value of the res, it is necessary for the defendants in the present case, in which the value of the res far exceeds the salvage award, to maintain either that when bail has been given the limit is the amount of the bail, or that limit is fixed by the original claim in the action. With regard to the first of these propositions, it may well be that for certain purposes the bail represents the released res. This would appear to be so with regard to conferring freedom from re-arrest, according to the opinion expressed by DR. LUSHINGTON in The Wild Ranger (25) and The Kalamazoo (18), though even this must be understood, as DR. LUSHINGTON explained in The Hero (26), to apply only to applications made for re-arrest after final judgment, which the cases of The Freir, The Albert (27), and The Miriam (28) show to mean final judgment after an appeal, and not even then to be an invariable rule, as the judgment of the same learned judge in The Flora (29) shows, or to extend to re-arrest for the purpose of obtaining costs, as the judgment of SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE in The Freedom (24) suggests. Again, it would seem that, if the res is of less value than the bail, the bail is so far identified with the res that the bondsmen are liable only up to the value

A of the res: The Staffordshire (30). Again, as held by FRY, J., in The Christiansborg (31):

"bail is equivalent of the res, and that whilst the bail has been given for the thing, it is, if not impossible, highly improper that another action should be allowed to go on against the res in another place."

B In these senses and for these purposes bail stands in the place of the res. But it is quite another thing to say that the liability of the owners is confined to the same amount as the liability of the bail, and that the ship or any other goods of the defendant cannot be taken in execution under the provisions which continue the powers given to the Admiralty Court by the Act of 1861, as SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE, in The Freedom (24) thought was possible as regards costs.

C The very form of the bail bond in the present day as given in WILLIAMS AND BRUCE'S ADMIRALTY PRACTICE (2nd Edn.), p. 636, and the early practice I have referred to in CLERKE'S PRAXIS seem to show that the bail is liable in a specified amount for the payment by the defendants of the whole amount of the judgment. Then, further, The Jonge Bastiaan (2) seems to me to be in point, and indeed to be on all-fours with the present case. There a salvage action in rem having

D been entered for £800 and bail given, which I presume was for the same amount, LORD STOWELL held that the court was by no means limited by any particular demand of the parties, and he awarded two-thirds of the value of the property salvaged, which was stated to be £3,400. LORD STOWELL clearly in this case did not consider a fresh action necessary, though in another case, probably under different circumstances, DR. LUSHINGTON is reported as saying that he had done so: see per DR. LUSHINGTON, Re Silver Bullion (32), 2 Ecc. & Ad. at p. 75. The Zephyr (19) is of course a further authority to the same effect.

There remains only the question whether the amount of the original claim limits the amount of the enforceable judgment I have no doubt that it does not. I think that, under the former practice, although DR. LUSHINGTON in The Zephyr (19) appears to have doubted it, the claim in the præcipe could be exceeded without

F actual formal amendment. The Jonge Bastiaan (2) is a clear authority on this point. I regard The Hero (26) and The Johannes (33) as decisions to the same effect. But, whether or not a præcipe could be so dealt with, the original claim now appears on the writ, and there is no doubt that a writ can be, and in this case has been, amended before final judgment. I should have regretted if I had been unable to accede to the present motion, because, as it is clear that, if a

G plaintiff's claim is not satisfied by one kind of action, he can resort to another (cf. The Clara (6) and The Orient (34)), the only result of refusal would be to drive the plaintiffs to bring another action. But for the reasons I have given I think the present application may be granted in order to enable the plaintiffs to issue execution in the present action for the full amount of the decree which they have obtained.

Thomas Mirams was chaplain at the Birmingham workhouse and at the Birmingham workhouse infirmary. His joint stipend or salary was £250 per annum. The joint appointment was solely in the hands of the Birmingham guardians, but he could only be dismissed by the Local Government Board. His stipend or salary was paid out of the rates. On Dec. 24, 1889, he executed an assignment of his salary in favour of W. G. Coulton for securing the repayment of a loan of £49 with interest. On Oct. 31. 1890, Thomas Mirams was adjudicated bankrupt.

- A The questions for the opinion of the High Court were: (i) Whether the assignment to Mr. Coulton is void or voidable in so far as relates to the assignment of or charge upon the aforesaid stipend. (ii) Whether the said salary or stipend was void or voidable as being contrary to public policy: (a) Because the bankrupt was a public officer holding a public appointment, and paid out of the public funds; (b) because he was a clerk in holy orders and his salary was payable to him

- C Feb. 20, 1891. CAYE, J., read the following judgment.—The question in this case is whether a charge given by the bankrupt on his salary as chaplain of the Birmingham workhouse and workhouse infirmary is void on the ground of public policy. As we all know, certain kinds of contracts have been held void at common law on this ground—a branch of the law, however, which certainly should not be extended, as judges are more to be trusted as interpreters of the law than as expounders of what is called public policy. I have been referred to Grenfell v. Dean and Canons of Windsor (1) and Ex parte Huggins (2) as containing the clearest expositions of the law on this subject. In the former case it was pointed out that, in order to avoid the assignment of the pay or salary of an officer on this ground, the office must be a public one in some way connected with the public service, and that the public is interested not only in the performance from time to time of the duties of the office, but also in the fit state of preparation of the party having to perform them. On the former ground the pay or salary of persons in the service of the Crown, and on the latter ground the half-pay of officers in the military or naval service cannot be assigned. Similarly in Ex parte Huggins (2), it was laid down that pay given to induce persons to keep themselves ready for the service of the Crown, and pay for actual services rendered to the
- F Crown, cannot be assigned. On these grounds it has been held that the salary of a clerk of the peace, a freehold office connected with the administration of justice, cannot be assigned: Palmer v. Bate (3); nor can the salary of an assistant parliamentary counsel to the Treasury: Cooper v. Reilly (4).

- It was in consequence of some of the expressions made use of by LORD LANGDALE, M.R., in Grenfell v. Dean and Canons of Windsor (1) that this Case was stated
- G for my opinion, the learned judge of the county court entertaining some doubt whether a clergyman having the cure of souls was not a public officer within the meaning of the principle in question. Upon consideration I think that those doubts, although natural, are not warranted by any decided case. It has never been held that a clergyman having the cure of souls is a public officer, and, as I have said above, the doctrine in question ought not to be extended. At common
- H law a beneficed clergyman could charge his benefice, and although this was made unlawful by the 13 Eliz., c. 20, yet when that Act was repealed in 1803 by the 43 Geo. 3, c. 84, a charge given between 1803 and 1817, when the 43 Geo. 3, c. 84, was repealed, and the 13 Eliz., c. 20, was revived by the 57 Geo. 3, c. 99, was held valid: Metcalf v. Archbishop of York (5).

- I In this case it is true that a salary is paid out of a poor rate, and that the chaplain, although appointed by the guardians, can only be dismissed by the Local Government Board; but I am of opinion that this is no solid ground of distinction. To make the office a public office the pay must come out of national and not out of local funds, and the office must be public in the strict sense of that term. It is not enough that the due discharge of the duties of the office should be for the public benefit in a secondary and remote sense. I must, therefore, answer the questions put to me by saying that, in my judgment, the charge is not invalid on the ground suggested.

With regard to the second point, there is, I think, no question that, during the continuance of the bankruptcy and of the office, the salary subject to the charge vests in the trustee as property of the bankrupt within s. 44, subject to the power of the court to make an order under s. 53(2), appropriating the salary in the manner therein pointed out.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaughan Williams, J.), May 5, 6, 7, 11, 1891]

Nuisance—Noise—Interference with comfort—Water works—Noise and vibration caused by working of pumps—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict., c. 17), s. 12.

The defendants, a water company, in pursuance of their statutory powers, sank a shaft on land adjoining the plaintiff's house, in doing which it became necessary to have recourse to pumping in order to keep the shaft clear of water. For this purpose the defendants used lift pumps, the noise and vibration of which seriously interfered with the plaintiff's comfort. The plaintiff having commenced an action against the defendants for nuisance, the defendants substituted centrifugal pumps for the lift pumps, which considerably diminished the noise and vibration. It was physically possible for the defendants to have used centrifugal pumps in the first instance, but they were not generally used and were less convenient in the initial stages of excavation.

Held: the authority conferred by the statute on the defendants to sink the shaft included all things reasonably necessary for the execution of the work, and, the defendants having used reasonable skill and care to avoid causing annoyance to the plaintiff and having acted without negligence, were not liable in nuisance.

Action by the plaintiff, David Harrison, against the defendants, the Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co., for nuisance, claiming an injunction and damages.

H The plaintiff was the owner and occupier of a villa and garden adjoining a piece of land fronting on the river Thames, in the parish of Hampton Wick. The defendants had acquired under their statutory powers a strip of land abutting on the river, bounded on one side by the plaintiff's garden and on the other by Kingston Bridge, for the purpose of sinking a shaft in order to construct a tunnel under the bed of the river for the purpose of laying pipes in connection with their statutory undertaking. The facts as found by the learned judge were as follows:
I The defendants sunk the shaft in the land adjacent to the plaintiff's house in pursuance of the powers conferred on them by the Southwark and Vauxhall Water Act, 1866, and the Acts incorporated therewith (including the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847), and in the execution of those powers used certain lift pumps to pump out the land water which ran into the shaft in increasing quantities as the shaft was being sunk. The noise arising from the use of the pumps, which necessarily were kept working day and night, seriously interfered with the comfort of the plaintiff and the other inmates of the plaintiff's house. The pumps were kept in use for about three weeks, until the sinking of the shaft arrived at a point at which it was A no longer necessary to lower the pumps to any greater depth for that purpose.

The defendants in the course of sinking the shaft might have used other pumps which would have made somewhat less noise than the lift pumps actually employed, e.g., a centrifugal pump known as the Woodford pump, and they had in fact used two of such pumps in substitution for the lift pumps ever since the sinking of the shaft arrived at the point of depth above mentioned. The Wood- B ford pumps were not usually employed in sinking shafts, and were not convenient for that purpose on account, among other things, of the difficulty of lowering and lengthening them, a process which would involve from time to time stopping the working of the pumps, and allowing the water to rise in the shaft so as to cause a loosening of the earth behind the wooden lining of the shaft, and consequent risk to the men employed, and also on account of the increased labour in digging C at the bottom of the shaft by reason of the superincumbent water.

Those difficulties and that risk were capable of being overcome by the use of iron rings for the lining of the shaft and the use of two Woodford pumps, so that one pump might always be at work while the other pump was being lowered and lengthened. The use of two pumps, however, would have involved an increase in the diameter of the shaft, and that increase in the diameter of the shaft would D have required great care to avoid loosening the foundations of Kingston Bridge, which were in immediate proximity to the narrow piece of land on which the defendants were sinking the shaft. The defendants were guilty of no negligence in using the pumps which they did use for the sinking of the shaft, which were the pumps ordinarily used for such a purpose, even when shafts were sunk in towns and in the neighbourhood of houses. The defendants in the first instance intended E to use lift pumps in the shaft so long as it might be necessary to use pumps in the shaft, i.e., for a period extending over many months, and in point of fact the centrifugal pumps were still at work at the date of the trial of the action.

The plaintiff through his solicitors began to remonstrate with the defendants as to the noise caused by the pumping on Oct. 6, 1890, and the correspondence between the parties continued till Oct. 20, when the plaintiff issued and served F the writ in this action, and gave notice of motion for an interim injunction. The defendants on Oct. 22 gave notice to the plaintiff of their intention to substitute centrifugal pumps for the lift pumps previously used, and about Oct. 28 did substitute the centrifugal pumps. The effect of using centrifugal pumps was to diminish to some extent the noise of the pumping, and the plaintiff alleged that, after the change was effected, the pumping caused him no serious annoyance. G

May 11, 1891. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., stated the facts, and continued: H
The plaintiff in my opinion is not entitled to the injunction or damages which he claims. It was contended before me on behalf of the plaintiff that, if the noise of the pumping was physically capable of reduction by the use of the Woodford pump, as it in fact was, the plaintiff was entitled to maintain this action, and that it was no answer to his claim for the defendants to say that they used reasonable skill and care to avoid causing annoyance to the plaintiff, and were guilty of no I negligence.

In my opinion, however, the defendants have a good defence by reason of their use of reasonable skill and care and the absence of negligence. In the first place, it seems to me that if the defendants had without statutory authority sunk this shaft and done this pumping for any lawful and ordinary purpose in the exercise of their powers as private owners of the land, they would not have been responsible as for a nuisance. It frequently happens that the owners or occupiers of land cause, in the execution of lawful works in the ordinary user of the land, a con-

- A considerable amount of temporary annoyance to their neighbours, but they are not necessarily on that account held to be guilty of causing an unlawful nuisance. The business of life could not be carried on if it were so. For instance, a man who pulls down his house for the purpose of building a new one, no doubt causes considerable inconvenience to his next-door neighbours during the process of demolition; but he is not responsible as for a nuisance if he uses all reasonable
- B skill and care to avoid annoyance to his neighbour by the works of demolition. Nor is he liable to an action even though the noise and dust and the consequent annoyance be such as would constitute a nuisance if the same, instead of being created for the purpose of demolition of the house, had been created in sheer wantonness, or in the execution of works for a purpose involving a permanent continuance of the noise and dust. For the law in judging what constitutes a
- C nuisance does take into consideration both the object and duration of that which is said to constitute the nuisance: Ball v. Ray (2). It seems to me, therefore, that the defendants are, to say the least, placed by their statute in the same position as private persons. The statute, by making the sinking of the shaft intra vires, and, therefore, lawful, has enabled the defendants lawfully to do that which private persons may do without any statutory authority. That being so, it seems to me
- D that the obligations of the defendants in respect of the sinking of the shaft are neither greater nor less than those of a private person, and that a private person would not in similar circumstances be held to have created a legal nuisance by reason of the annoyance caused to his neighbours in the pumping for the purpose of sinking the shaft, unless it could be shown that he had neglected to take all reasonable precautions for mitigating the annoyance to his neighbours.
- E Let me assume, however, that the sinking of the shaft would be a nuisance if done by a private person. The statute has authorised the sinking of the shaft, but the works and the manner of the execution must be distinguished. The statute has undoubtedly authorised the work, but what has it authorised in respect of the manner of execution? The plaintiff says that the statute has authorised the work, together with all things absolutely necessary for the execution thereof. I think not.
- F I think that the statute has authorised the execution of the work, together with all things reasonably necessary for the execution thereof. It was urged in argument that SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., had decided in Fenwick v. East London Rail. Co. (1) that all that was authorised by the Railways Clauses Act, as incorporated in the special Acts of railway companies, was what was absolutely necessary for the execution of the statutory works; but, if the case is looked at, it will be seen that it
- G has nothing to do with the manner of execution, but only with the works authorised to be executed. So far as the manner of execution is concerned, all that is necessary is that the works should be done with as little damage or annoyance as can be; that is, as reasonably can be. The words of s. 12 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, are, it will be observed, almost identical with the words of s. 16 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.
- H This seems to me to be the principle accepted by the House of Lords in Geddis v. Bann Reservoir (Proprietors) (3). This also is the principle which seems to me to govern the decision of Freemantle v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (4). A.-G. v. Gas Light and Coke Co. (5), and the other gas company cases, depend, in my opinion, on the special words used in the Gas Works Clauses Act, 1847, s. 29, viz.:
- I "Nothing in this or the special Act contained shall prevent the undertakers from being liable to an indictment for nuisance, or to any other legal proceeding to which they may be liable in consequence of making or supplying gas."

I find nothing of that kind in the Waterworks Clauses Act; because s. 27 of that Act, which is the corresponding section to s. 29 of the Gas Clauses Act, is limited to damage to mines. Judgment must be for the defendants with costs, unless the defendants consent to forgo their costs.

The defendants consented to the action being dismissed without costs.

Criminal Law—Evidence—Confession—Inducement held out indirectly—Possibility of advantage to be inferred from language of person in authority.

A confession of guilt, in order to be admissible in evidence in criminal proceedings, must have been made voluntarily, and not in response to any threat or to any suggestion of advantage to be inferred either directly or indirectly from language used by a person in a position of authority in connection with the prosecution of the person by whom the confession was made.

On the trial of the prisoner on a charge of embezzling money from a company it was sought to put in evidence an alleged confession by him. Before the confession was made the chairman of the company had had an interview with the prisoner's brother and brother-in-law in which he had said: "It will be the right thing for [the prisoner] to make a clean breast of it." At the time of the confession, however, no threat or promise was made to the prisoner himself, but the court drew the inference that at that time the prisoner had been informed of the chairman's statement to his brother.

Held: it had not been proved that the confession had been made freely and voluntarily, and evidence of it was, therefore, inadmissible.

A Case Stated by Westmorland Quarter Sessions for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved.

At Westmorland Quarter Sessions held at Kendal on Oct. 21, 1892, Marcellus Thompson was tried on a charge of embezzling moneys belonging to the Kendal Union Gas and Water Co., his masters. William Dillworth Crewdson, the chairman of the company, at whose instance the warrant for the prisoner's apprehension had been issued, was called as a witness by the prosecution to prove, among other things, a confession of the prisoner. As soon as the confession was sought to be put in evidence objection was taken to its admissibility, and the justices, before receiving further proof, allowed Mr. Crewdson to be cross-examined by prisoner's counsel. In answer to the latter's questions, he stated that, prior to the confession being made, the prisoner's brother and brother-in-law had sought an interview with him, and had come to see him, and that at this interview he had said to the prisoner's brother-in-law in course of conversation: "It will be the right thing for Marcellus to make a clean breast of it." He added:

D "I won't swear I didn't say it would be better for him to make a clean breast of it. I may have done so. I don't think I did. I expected what I said would be communicated to the prisoner. I won't swear I did not intend it should be conveyed to the prisoner. I should expect it would. I made no threat or promise to induce the prisoner to make a confession. I held out no hope that criminal proceedings would not be taken."

No evidence was produced to the court tending to prove that the details of the interview had been communicated to the prisoner, nor to rebut the evidence of E Mr. Crewdson as to what took place at the interview.

It was then contended by prisoner's counsel that the above statements to the brothers were inducements held out to the prisoner to confess by a person in authority which rendered the evidence tendered by the prosecution inadmissible.

Quarter Sessions found that Mr. Crewdson was a person in authority, and inferred that the details of the interview would be communicated to the prisoner. F They also found as a fact that the statements made by him were calculated to elicit the truth, and that the confession was voluntary, and they accordingly admitted the evidence. Mr. Crewdson then proved that after the interview he charged the prisoner with embezzling the company's money, and one of the directors told the prisoner he was in a very embarrassing position. The prisoner replied, "I know that; I will give the company all the help I can." He said, in answer to Mr. Crewdson's charge, "Yes, I took it, but I do not think it is more than £1,000. It might be a few pounds more." No statement was made to the G prisoner that the confession would save him from prosecution, and no threat, and no promise were given. Subsequently the prisoner made out a list of moneys which he admitted had not been accounted for by him, which list was also admitted in evidence. The prisoner was convicted, and sentenced to three years' H penal servitude.

The case was first argued on Jan. 21, 1893, and in the course of the argument a statement was made that there was evidence at the trial of money having been paid on behalf of the prisoner into the water company's bank account subsequently to the making of the confession. The court forming the opinion that the Case I should be sent back for such fact to be stated if it had been proved. The Case was therefore sent back and was amended by additional statements, gathered from the chairman's notes of evidence taken at the trial, which were as follows:

At a meeting of the directors on Aug. 9, a question was asked by one of the directors (Mr. Pollitt) as to the value of the stock on a farm at Matland occupied by the prisoner's brother, and it was suggested that a bill of sale over the stock should be given. The prisoner stated that the worth of the stock was over £1,000, but that he could not accept the suggestion about the security without telling his brother. At the same meeting, prisoner said, "My brothers have got it [meaning the money]. It has gone to pay interest on mortgages." Mr. W. D. Crewdson A stated, "I never agreed not to prosecute if a bill of sale were given."

£340 was received from the prisoner after the charge was made, also some money found in the cashbox, also the IOU for the sum of £25 found in the cashbox. Of the sum of £340, £90 was paid into the bank by the prisoner, £250 by his brother. Mr. Crewdson stated that no arrangement was made as to the discrepancy being treated as a debt, and that the sum paid was simply by way of restitution. B

The question for the opinion of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved was, whether the evidence of the confession was properly admitted.

Shee, Q.C. (Cavanagh with him) for the prisoner.

Segar (C. M. Wilson with him) for the Crown.

April 29, 1893. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case we are all agreed C that the conviction cannot be supported, and my brother CAVE has written a judgment which we have all read, and with which we all agree.

CAVE, J., read the following judgment of the court.—The question in this case is whether a particular admission made by the prisoner was admissible in evidence against him. This is a question which must necessarily arise for decision in D a number of cases both at petty and quarter sessions, and to my mind it is very unsatisfactory that the principle which must guide the decision of magistrates in these cases should be loosely or confusedly interpreted.

Many reasons may be urged in favour of the admissibility of all confessions, subject, of course, to their being tested by the cross-examination of those who E heard and testify of them, and BENTHAM seems to have been of this opinion: see RATIONALE OF JUDICIAL EVIDENCE, Bk. 5, chap. 6, s. 3. But this is not the law of England. By that law, to be admissible, a confession must be free and voluntary. If it proceeds from remorse and a desire to make reparation for the crime, it is admissible. If it flows from hope or fear excited by a person in authority, it is inadmissible. On this point the authorities are unanimous. As F Mr. TAYLOR says in his LAW OF EVIDENCE (8th Edn.), p. 2, chap. 15, s. 872:

"Before any confession can be received in evidence in a criminal case, it must be shown to have been voluntarily made, for, to adopt the somewhat inflated language of EYRE, C.B.:

'A confession forced from the mind by the flattery of hope or by the torture of fear comes in so questionable a shape, when it is to be considered as the evidence of guilt, that no credit ought to be given to it, and, therefore, it is rejected.' G

The material question consequently is whether the confession has been obtained by the influence of hope or fear; and the evidence to this point, being in its nature preliminary, is addressed to the judge, who will require the prosecutor to show affirmatively to his satisfaction that the statement was not made under the influence of an improper inducement, and who, in the event of any doubt subsisting on this head, will reject the confession." H

The case cited for this position is R. v. Warringham (1), where PARKE, B., says to the counsel for the prosecution (2 Den. at p. 448): I

"You are bound to satisfy me that the confession which you seek to use in evidence against the prisoner was not obtained from him by improper means. I am not satisfied of that, for it is impossible to collect from the answers of this witness whether such was the case or not."

PARKE, B., adds (ibid.): "I reject the evidence of this witness, not being satisfied that it was voluntary." In R. v. Baldry (2) it is said by POLLOCK, C.B., that the true ground of the exclusion is not that there is any presumption of law that a

A confession not free and voluntary is false, but that it would not be safe to receive a statement made under any influence or fear. He also explains that the objection to telling the prisoner that it would be better to speak the truth is that the words import that it would be better for him to say something. With this view the statutory caution agrees, which commences with the words, "You are not obliged to say anything unless you desire to do so."

B These principles are re-stated and affirmed by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in R. v. Fennell (3) in the following words (7 Q.B.D. at pp. 150, 151):

C "The rule laid down in RUSSELL ON CRIMES (5th Edn.), vol. 3, pp. 441, 442, is that a confession, in order to be admissible, must be free and voluntary; that is, must not be extracted by any sort of threats or violence, nor obtained by any direct or implied promises, however slight, nor by the exertion of any improper influence. It is well known that the chapter in RUSSELL ON CRIMES containing that passage was written by SIR E. V. WILLIAMS, a great authority upon these matters."

D If these principles and the reasons for them are, as it seems impossible to doubt, well founded, they afford to magistrates a simple test by which the admissibility of a confession may be decided. They have to ask: Is it proved affirmatively that the confession was free and voluntary—that is, was it preceded by any inducement held out by a person in authority to make a statement? If so, and the inducement has not clearly been removed before the statement was made, evidence of the statement is inadmissible.

E In the present case the magistrates appeared to have intended to state the evidence which was before them, and to ask our opinion whether, on that evidence, they did right in admitting the confession. There was obviously some ground for suspecting that the confession might not have been free and voluntary; and the question is whether the evidence was such as ought to have satisfied their minds that it was free and voluntary. Unfortunately, in my judgment, the magistrates do not seem to have understood what the precise point to be determined was, or what evidence was necessary to elicit it.

F The new evidence now before us throws a strong light on what was the object of the interview between Mr. Crewdson and the prisoner's brother and brother-in-law, why he made any communication to them, and why he expected what he said would be communicated to the prisoner. There is, indeed, no evidence that any communication was made to the prisoner at all; but it seems to me that after Mr. Crewdson's statement that he had spoken to the prisoner's brother and brother-in-law about the desirability of the prisoner's making a clean breast of it, with the expectation that what he had said would be communicated to the prisoner, it was incumbent on the prosecution to prove whether any, and, if so, what, communication was actually made to the prisoner before the magistrates could properly be satisfied that the confession was free and voluntary. The magistrates go on to say that they inferred that the details of the interview would be (by which, I suppose, they intend to say that they inferred they were) communicated to the prisoner, which seems to have been the right inference to draw under the circumstances. They add that they found as a fact that the statements made by Crewdson were calculated to elicit the truth, and that the confession was voluntary.

H The first of these findings, if the ruling of POLLOCK, C.B., in R. v. Baldry (2) is (as I take it to be) correct, is entirely immaterial. The second finding, if it is a corollary from the first, does not follow from it, and if it is an independent finding, is not warranted by the evidence; and as the question for us is whether this finding was warranted by the evidence, I feel compelled to say that, in my judgment, it was not. Taking the statement of Mr. Crewdson to have been: "It will be the right thing for Marcellus to make a statement," and that that statement was communicated to the prisoner, I should say that that communication was calculated, in the language of POLLOCK, C.B., to lead the prisoner to believe that it would be better for him to say something. All this, however, is matter of conjecture; and I prefer to put my judgment on the ground that it is the duty of the prosecution to prove, in case of doubt, that the prisoner's statement was free and voluntary, and that they did not discharge themselves of this obligation. A

I would add, for my part, I always suspect these confessions, which are supposed to be the offspring of penitence and remorse, and which, nevertheless, are repudiated by the prisoner at the trial. It is remarkable that it is of very rare occurrence for evidence of a confession to be given when the proof of the prisoner's guilt is otherwise clear and satisfactory; but when it is not clear and satisfactory the prisoner is not infrequently alleged to have been seized with the desire, born of penitence and remorse, to supplement it with a confession, and this desire itself again vanishes as soon as he appears in a court of justice. In this particular case there is no reason to suppose that Mr. Crewdson's evidence was not perfectly true and accurate; but, on the broad, plain ground that it was not proved satisfactorily that the confession was free and voluntary I think it ought not to have been received. No other principle can, in my judgment, be safely worked by magistrates. B C

Portions—Double portions—Settlement—Eldest son predeceasing life-tenant—Estate passing to second son—Claims of eldest son and second son. G

Land was limited to a father for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, the trustees being given power on the father's death to raise £20,000 as portions for the children other than the eldest son. The father had a power of appointment over the portions fund, and there was the usual hotchpot clause. There were five children. The eldest son disentailed with his father's consent, and the land was re-settled to such uses as the father and the eldest son should jointly appoint, and, subject thereto, to such uses as were declared by the original settlement. The father and the eldest son then raised the sum of £8,000 by mortgage of the settled land, £3,000 of which was paid to the eldest son. The £20,000 portion fund was then appointed by the father equally among the four younger children. The eldest son died in his father's lifetime, and on the father's death the land passed to the second son in tail. The personal representative of the eldest son claimed that the second son was not entitled also to the quarter share of the portion fund which had been appointed to him, and that, as the eldest son had not succeeded to the estates, he was entitled to share in the portions fund as if he had been a younger child. H I

Held: (i) according to the normal rules, the time for ascertaining the class of younger children entitled to portions was the time fixed for distribution

- A of the portions fund, and, as the eldest son had then died, he would be entitled to share in the fund as if he had been a younger child, whereas the eldest son then living was excluded from sharing in the fund under the doctrine of double portions; (ii) in the present case, however, as the eldest son had received £3,000 in his father's life-time, this had to be treated in the absence of contrary evidence as worth £5,000 on the father's death, that being the aliquot share of each of the younger children, and he had, therefore, received his full share of the portions fund; and (iii) as only the "eldest" son was excluded from the portions fund, the second son was entitled to a share in it even though the bulk of the estate passed to him.

The term stood limited upon trust, if there should be one or more child or children of the marriage "other than and not being an eldest or only son for the time being entitled under the before-mentioned limitations to the settled estates either in possession or in remainder expectant upon the decease of the said Henry Fitzgerald," that the trustees should, after his decease, or with his consent in his lifetime, raise the sum, in certain events which afterwards
- H happened, of £20,000, for portions for younger children. Such sum was to be divided among them as Henry Fitzgerald and his wife should as therein directed appoint, and in default of such appointment, to be equally divided between such children; and it was further provided that any child entitled to a share under such appointment should not be entitled to any further share in the unappointed part of such moneys set aside or intended for portions, until he should have brought into hotchpot any appointed share, and accounted for such share accordingly.

- I Five children were born of the marriage, George, Charles, and three others; George attained the age of twenty-one years in 1861.

In 1863 Henry Fitzgerald and George Fitzgerald executed a disentailing assurance of the settled estates. By this the estates were limited to such uses as Henry Fitzgerald and George Fitzgerald should by deed jointly appoint, and, subject thereto, to the use of Henry Fitzgerald for life, and in confirmation of the life estate limited to him by the marriage settlement, and after his death to such uses as George Fitzgerald, if he survived him, should appoint, and subject to such limitations to the uses declared by the marriage settlement. Henry Fitzgerald and George Fitzgerald, in exercise of their power of appointment, subsequently mortgaged the estates for various sums amounting to £8,000. Of these sums part, amounting to £3,000, was paid to George Fitzgerald for his own absolute use.

A sum of £5,000 was, under the powers above mentioned, appointed by Henry Fitzgerald and his wife to each of their four younger children in 1867 and 1868. In 1873 George Fitzgerald died without issue.

In 1890 Henry Fitzgerald died, and the portions then became distributable.

The defendant J. Boyd, the legal personal representative of George Fitzgerald, now claimed £2,000, part of one sum of £5,000, contending that, as Charles Fitzgerald had become entitled to the settled estates as eldest son, the appointment of the sum of £5,000 failed, and that such sum must, as unappointed, pass to George Fitzgerald under the hotchpot clause. He admitted that the sum of £3,000 paid to George Fitzgerald for his own use out of the moneys raised by him and his father, should be treated as advancement or part payment, and consequently claimed £2,000 only.

For Charles Fitzgerald it was argued that the representative of George Fitzgerald could not seek to place him in the position of a younger son, by reason of his not succeeding to the settled estates, as he had acquired a dominion over the estates, and had exercised such dominion by mortgaging under the power of appointment for that purpose. The trustees of the marriage settlement took out an originating summons to have the question determined whether J. Boyd was entitled to the £2,000, or any part of the £5,000, or whether the appointment of £5,000 to Charles Fitzgerald was valid.

CHITTY, J.—The contest is between Charles, the second-born son, and the executors of George, the eldest-born son, as to which of them is entitled to a sum of £5,000—part of £20,000 which was provided as portions for younger children.

Courts of equity have taken a broad view of settlements of this kind, and, looking at the substance, have held that son to be the eldest who takes the estate, that is, the bulk of it less the portions. And the rule is that, subject to any special terms in the settlement, the time for ascertaining the class of younger children who are entitled to portions, is the time fixed by the settlement for the distribution of the portions fund. It is then the court ascertains who is the eldest son, and he, when found, is excluded from sharing in the fund under the doctrine of double portions. Had there been in this case no disentailing deed, the result would be plain, and George, although the eldest-born son, would be entitled to share in the portions fund as a younger son, on the ground that by dying before his father he never became entitled to the estate under the limitations of the settlement; and Charles, who had become so entitled, would have become also the eldest son within the meaning of the settlement.

But there is a second rule, adopted by the House of Lords in Collingwood v. Stanhope (2), that, although the period fixed by the settlement for the distribution of the fund is the time for ascertaining who is to be included in and who excluded from those entitled to share therein, yet a further inquiry is necessary; for the court excludes, as being an eldest son entitled to the estate, an eldest son who, being then dead, has previously taken the bulk of the settled estate. In that case the father and son disentailed. What they do with the estate which they so

A place under their dominion is immaterial, for the estate is thereby taken out of the settlement. They did re-settle the estate, and made it devolve on the eldest son for life with remainder to his issue in tail, so that it was, in effect, taken away from the person entitled as tenant in tail under the old settlement. But it was in the power of the father and son to have sold the estate and retained the purchase money, in which case the eldest son would plainly have been taking the bulk of the estate.

B The present case is not similar to Collingwood v. Stanhope (2), and indeed there appears to be no similar case in the books. George concurred with his father in re-settling the estate in the usual way, to such uses as they should by deed jointly appoint, and subject thereto to the use of the father in confirmation of his life estate under the settlement, and after his death to such uses as the son, if he survived, should appoint, and subject thereto to the uses of the old settlement.

C It is unnecessary for me to say what the result would have been if the joint or the separate powers of appointment had not been exercised. It may be that, notwithstanding the words in the old settlement—"entitled under the before-mentioned limitations"—equity would have looked at the substance, and have said that, as in the result the original settlement was left unaffected, it would disregard the disentailing deed and resettlement. This question I leave open, for, in fact,

D the joint power was exercised by creating mortgages of the settled estate, in 1863 for £5,000, and in 1870 for £3,000. By this means the eldest son's interest under the settlement, in other words the bulk of the settled estate itself, was diminished by £8,000. And, assuming it to be material to show how much of this was received by the son, and I am not satisfied that is material, it appears that he received £3,000, and, applying the reasoning of LORD ST. LEONARDS in Harrison v. Round (1) in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the conclusion is that this £3,000 was the present value of £5,000 at the death of the father, the tenant for life; that it was a fair bargain, under which the son got his full share of the sum raised. And, indeed, the father did survive until 1890.

E Therefore, the estate to which Charles has succeeded was diminished in value by this sum of £3,000, and this sum was received by George. He has, therefore had out of the estate a substantial portion, more than equal to his share of the £20,000 raisable for the younger children; he has, in fact, anticipated his portion. The case might be doubtful if, on similar trusts, a small or trifling sum only were raisable by the eldest son, and it may be that such a sum would be disregarded. I leave that question untouched. But where an eldest son, by virtue of his ownership of the estate itself, has charged the inheritance with a sum equal to or in excess of his share of the portions fund, then the doctrine as to double portions applies against him, and he is not entitled to any share of the portions fund. I hold, therefore, that George Fitzgerald is excluded from claiming to be a younger son in order to share in the fund. And, as the terms of the settlement exclude only the eldest or only son, it follows that this £5,000 passes to Charles Fitzgerald.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.), January 23, 1891]

Obligation of master to continue to carry on business.*

The defendant, who was a shirt manufacturer, agreed that the plaintiff should act as his agent and traveller to obtain orders for the sale of shirts "manufactured or sold" by the defendant, the agency being determinable after five years and the plaintiff to receive a commission from such sales. During the five years the defendant's factory was burnt down, and he ceased to carry on his business or to employ the plaintiff.

Held: (i) as the defendant had expressly agreed to employ the plaintiff, the contract obliged him to do what was necessary to enable the plaintiff to earn his commission; and (ii) as there was no evidence that it was impossible for the defendant to carry on the business of manufacturing or selling shirts at another factory, the defendant was not excused from performing his obligation under the contract.

Per KAY, L.J.: If it had been shown that not only the factory, but also the business, of the defendant had been destroyed by vis major without any default of the defendant, I think that the plaintiff could not recover.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of GRANTHAM, J., holding that he was not entitled to recover damages for a breach by the defendant of an agreement to employ him as a commission agent.

By an agreement dated Jan. 31, 1887, and made between the defendant John Goldsmith, "of Taunton, in the county of Somerset, and any partner he may hereafter take into business carrying on business as shirt, collar, and cuff manufacturers under the style of the 'Priory Manufacturing Co.,' and hereafter called the said company," of the one part, and the defendant Albert Siddon Turner, of 54 Jewin Street, in the city of London, agent and traveller, of the other part, it was recited as follows:

"Whereas, in consideration of the agreement of the said A. S. Turner, the said company agree to employ the said A. S. Turner as their agent, canvasser, and traveller, upon the terms and subject to the stipulations and conditions hereinafter contained, and in consideration of the premises the said A. S. Turner hereby agrees with the said company, that he, the said A. S. Turner, shall and will diligently, faithfully, and honestly serve the said company as their agent, canvasser, and traveller upon the terms and subject to the stipulations and conditions hereinafter contained, and the said company so far as the conditions and stipulations are to be performed by them, and the said A. S. Turner so far as the conditions and stipulations are to be performed and observed by him respectively, hereby agree with the other or others of them to observe, perform, fulfil, and keep, the several conditions and stipulations hereinafter contained."

The stipulations in this agreement were so far as material as follows:

1st. The agency shall be deemed to have commenced on Jan. 31, 1887, and shall be determinable either by the said company or the said A. S. Turner at the end of five years from the date hereof upon three calendar months' notice in writing being given by the party desiring to determine the said agency to the other or others of them.

2nd. The said A. S. Turner shall do his utmost to obtain orders for and sell the various goods manufactured or sold by the said company as shall be from time to time forwarded or submitted by sample or pattern to him.

5th. The said A. S. Turner shall not either by himself, partner, agent, or other person whatsoever, sell, or offer for sale, any shirts, collars, cuffs, fronts, or any goods of the description manufactured or sold by the said company during the time he shall be in their employ or for a period of three months from the date of the determination of such agency, nor shall he act as agent for any company, agent, or firm for the sale of any such manufactured goods during such period.

8th. The said company shall pay to the said A. S. Turner the sum of three and three-quarters per cent. commission on all goods sold by him for them."

In March, 1889, the manufacturing premises of the defendant in Taunton, where he carried on the business of a shirt, collar, and cuff manufacturer, as "The Priory Manufacturing Co.," were destroyed by an accidental fire, and the defendant's business was thereby put an end to, and the defendant ceased thenceforth to employ the plaintiff as his agent. The plaintiff commenced this action on May 22, 1889, claiming £400 damages from the defendant for the breach of the agreement of Jan. 31, 1887. The defendant by his defence pleaded the occurrence of the fire, and that the employment of the plaintiff being impliedly conditional upon the continued existence of the business, the defendant by reason of such fire was excused from further performance of the said agreement. The case was tried before a jury, who assessed the damages at £125, and GRANTHAM, J., reserved the question whether there had been a breach of the contract. The question was subsequently argued before GRANTHAM, J., who gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff applied to the Court of Appeal for a new trial or judgment.

Winch, Q.C., and Kisch for the plaintiff.

E. U. Bullen for the defendant.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an action for breach of contract in not employing the plaintiff for the period of five years. The contract turns upon the construction of the agreement entered into by the parties, and the application of it in the events which have happened.

The plaintiff wished to act as traveller to the defendant, and the defendant wished to engage him in that capacity. An agreement, dated Jan. 31, 1887, was entered into between them, which contained this recital:

"Whereas, in consideration of the agreement of the said A. S. Turner, the said company [i.e., Mr. Goldsmith and any partner he might have] agree to employ the said A. S. Turner as their agent, canvasser, and traveller, upon the terms and subject to the stipulations and conditions hereinafter contained; and in consideration of the premises the said A. S. Turner hereby agrees with the said company that he, the said A. S. Turner, shall and will diligently, faithfully, and honestly serve the said company as their agent, canvasser, and traveller, upon the terms and subject to the stipulations and conditions hereinafter contained."

Stopping there, we have a clear agreement by the company to employ the plaintiff, and by the plaintiff to serve the company—and on what terms? [His LORDSHIP read cl. 1 and 2 of the agreement, and continued:] Clause 5 is only material because it repeats the words "manufactured or sold by the said company." The 8th clause provides for the plaintiff's remuneration by a commission on the goods sold by him. The other clauses are not material as regards the question before us.

It was contended by the defendant that the agreement did not contain any stipulation that the company should furnish the plaintiff with any samples, and that there was, therefore, no agreement to do what was necessary to enable him to earn commission. The answer to that is that the company would not be employing the plaintiff within the meaning of the agreement unless they supplied him with samples to a reasonable extent.

Then it was said that there is no undertaking by the company to go on manufacturing. It is true that there is no express, nor, so far as I see, any implied undertaking by the company to manufacture even a single shirt; they might buy the articles in the market. The defendant's place of business was burnt down; the defendant has given up business, and has made no effort to resume it. The plaintiff says: "I am entitled to damages for your breach of the agreement to employ me for five years." The defendant pleads that the agreement

A was conditional on the continued existence of his business. On the face of the agreement there is no reference to the place of business, and no condition as to the defendant's continuing to manufacture or sell. How then can such a condition as the defendant contends for be implied? It was contended that the point was settled by authority. I will refer to three cases on the subject.

B In Rhodes v. Forwood (1) it was held that an action very similar to the present was not maintainable. But that case went on the ground that, there not being any express contract to employ the agent, such a contract could not be implied. In the present case we find an express contract to employ him.

C In Cowasjee Nanabhoy v. Lallbhoy Vullubhoy (3) there was a contract in a partnership deed to employ one of the partners during his life as sole agent to effect purchases and sales on behalf of the partnership at a commission upon his sales. The partnership was dissolved by decree of the High Court of Bombay on the ground that the business could not be carried on at a profit. It was held that the employment was to sell on behalf of the partnership, that, the partnership having come to an end, the employment ceased, and that the partner could not claim any compensation, for that a contract to carry on the partnership during the claimant's life under all circumstances could not be implied.

D Taylor v. Caldwell (2) contains some observations which are very much in point. BLACKBURN, J., there says (3 B. & S. at p. 833):

E "There seems no doubt that where there is a positive contract to do a thing, not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it or pay damages for not doing it, although in consequence of unforeseen accidents the performance of his contract has become unexpectedly burdensome or even impossible. . . . But this rule is only applicable when the contract is positive and absolute, and not subject to any condition either express or implied, and there are authorities which we think establish the principle that where from the nature of the contract it appears that the parties must, from the beginning, have known that it could not be fulfilled unless when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that when entering into the contract they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done, then, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case before breach performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor."

G The substance of that is, that the contract will be treated as subject to an implied condition, that it is to be in force only so long as a certain state of thing continues, in those cases only where the parties must have contemplated the continuing of that state of things as the foundation of what was to be done. Here the parties cannot be taken to have contemplated the continuance of the defendant's manufactory as the foundation of what was to be done; for, as I have already observed, the plaintiff's employment was not confined to articles manufactured by the defendant. The action, therefore, in my opinion, is maintainable.

I The plaintiff then is entitled to damages, and in my opinion not merely to nominal damages; for, if I am right in my construction of the agreement, he has suffered substantial loss. We think, however, that £125 is too much, and the plaintiff's counsel having agreed to take our assessment of damages rather than be sent to a new trial, we assess them at £50, and direct judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for that amount.

KAY, L.J.—LOPES, L.J., desires me to say that he concurs in our decision. If it had been shown that not only the manufactory but the business of the defendant had been destroyed by vis major, without any default of the defendant,

I think that the plaintiff could not recover. But there is no proof that it is impossible for the defendant to carry on business in articles of the nature mentioned in the agreement. The contract is peculiar; it is to employ the plaintiff for five years certain, with power to either party to determine the employment at the end of that time by notice. The defendant has ceased to employ the plaintiff within the five years, and contends that a condition is to be implied that the manufactory must continue to exist. The plaintiff is not seeking to import anything into the contract; the defendant seeks to import the implied condition I have mentioned. I cannot import any such condition.

If it had been proved that the defendant's power to carry on business had been taken away by something for which he was not responsible, I should say that there was no breach of the agreement; but here it was not taken away, and our decision is quite consistent with the class of cases where the parties have been excused from the performance of a contract because it was considered to be subject to an implied condition.

Landlord and Tenant—Repair—Liability of tenant—Covenant to repair, uphold and maintain—Old brick house built on logs of timber on muddy soil—Rotting of timber and consequent sinking and bulging of walls—Liability of tenant to underpin.

A landlord leased a house for a term of seven years to a tenant who covenanted to "... repair, uphold ... maintain ..." and so deliver up the premises. The house was a very old brick house built on logs of timber laid on a muddy soil, and in the course of time the walls sank and bulged owing to the rotting of the logs. After the expiration of the lease the landlord claimed that, if the tenant had underpinned the walls with concrete, it would not have become necessary, as it did, to pull down and re-build the house. In an action by the landlord claiming from the tenant the cost of demolishing and re-building the house as damages for breach of covenant,

Held: a covenant to repair was not a covenant to give the landlord a thing different from that which the tenant took when he entered into the covenant, and, therefore, the tenant was not bound to underpin walls which had sunk and bulged owing to the inherent nature of the house and the rotting of the logs on which it was built.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of GRANTHAM, J., by the plaintiffs, the landlords, in an action against the defendants, the tenants, to recover damages for breach of covenant to repair and deliver up in repair certain premises demised by the landlords to the tenants by a lease dated Nov. 22, 1883. GRANTHAM, J., held that the tenants had not committed any breach of covenant by not underpinning a wall and gave judgment for the tenants.

- E The lease was for a term of seven years from Michaelmas (Sept. 29), 1883, and contained a covenant by the tenants that they would

- F "At their own costs and charges, when and where, and so often as occasion should require, well, sufficiently, and substantially repair, uphold, sustain, maintain, glaze, pave, purge, scour, cleanse, empty, amend, and keep the premises, etc. . . . and so well and substantially repaired, upheld, supported, sustained, maintained, etc., at the end, or other sooner determination of the said term thereby granted would surrender and yield up the premises, etc."

- G On Aug. 22, 1890, the landlord's surveyor served on the tenants a notice specifying the repairs which they alleged the tenants were bound to execute in pursuance of the covenant. Part of the demised premises consisted of a dwelling house, and, in respect of this house, the notice stated as follows: "The brickwork of this front, although pointed up, is very much bulged, and must be dealt with." The tenants did not do anything to this wall. After the expiration of the lease, in September, 1890, the landlords began to deal with the wall of this house, and found, in November, 1891, that it was impossible then to repair it, but that it was necessary to pull down and re-build the house. The house was a very old brick house, more than a hundred years old, and was built upon muddy soil, in Lambeth, the walls being built upon what was called a mud-sill, that is, upon logs of timber laid upon the muddy soil. This timber had become rotten, and the wall had sunk and bulged. The landlords alleged that if the tenants had underpinned the walls with concrete during the term, it would not have become necessary subsequently to pull down and re-build the house.

- I The landlords claimed £700 damages, being the cost of and occasioned by pulling down and re-building the house. Lane, one of the tenants, died before the trial, and the action was continued against the other tenant, Nesham, as defendant.

McCall, Q.C., and Stewart Smith for tenant were not called on to argue.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case we have to consider what are the rules which govern an inquiry of this kind. In SMITH'S LANDLORD AND TENANT (3rd Edn.), at p. 302, I think that we get the result of the cases properly stated. I do not cite that book as an authority, but I read this passage because I think that it properly states the rule. The passage is as follows :

"These cases establish that where there is a general covenant to repair, the age and general condition of the house at the commencement of the tenancy are to be taken into consideration in considering whether the covenant has been broken; and that a tenant who enters upon an old house is not bound to leave it in the same state as if it were a new one."

That, I take it, is the right rule, and it is taken partly from Gutteridge v. Munyard (1), which is always cited upon the subject. In that case, TINDAL, C.J., in directing the jury, said (1 Mood. & R. at p. 336) :

"Where a very old building is demised, and the lessee enters into a covenant to repair, it is not meant that the old building is to be restored in a renewed form at the end of the term, or of greater value than it was at the commencement of the term. What the natural operation of time flowing on effects, and all that the elements bring about in diminishing the value, constitute a loss, which, so far as it results from time and nature, falls upon the landlord."

The condition of the house, therefore, at the time when it was demised must be looked at, and it must be considered what kind of a house it was and what was the nature of the house; e.g., whether it was a wooden house and not built of brick. If it was a house built upon wooden piles in soft ground, the tenant is not bound to put in concrete piles. Soward v. Leggatt (2) tried by LORD ABINGER, C.B., in effect, says that. In Soward v. Leggatt (2) LORD ABINGER, C.B., in directing the jury, said (7 C. & P. at p. 617) :

"The surveyor who has been called on the part of the plaintiff has given you an estimate; but it is also proved that when the repairs came to be done, they amounted to considerably more than the estimate; and that is generally the case, because when the work is actually done improvements are made for which the tenant is not liable, of which the improved mode of laying the joists in the kitchen is an example; and if the joists have been now laid in a manner which will make them more durable, and last longer before new ones are again wanted, that is a thing for which the tenant is not liable on the covenant to repair."

Those cases show that, if a tenant takes a house, which is such a house and of such a kind that, from its inherent nature, it will in course of time fall into a particular condition, the effects of it falling into such a condition will not constitute a breach of a covenant to repair, however large that covenant may be, and that a covenant to repair is not a covenant to give the landlord a thing different from that which the tenant took, and is not a covenant to make a new and a different thing. Moreover, the results of the nature and condition of the house, and the effects of time upon a house of such a nature and condition, do not constitute a breach of covenant to repair.

What then is the evidence in the present case? The house was an old house in Lambeth, built upon mud, a soft and shifting soil; the house was, therefore, built upon a kind of wooden platform which, so to speak, would float or rest upon the muddy soil. That was the nature and condition of this house. Whatever happened to such a house as that from lapse of time is the result of the operation of time and nature, which falls upon the landlord, and does not constitute a breach of a covenant to repair. Such results are not to be taken into account in considering whether there has been a breach of a covenant to repair. If, then, the natural results of the operation of time and nature upon such a house do not constitute a breach of a covenant to repair, the tenant is not bound to do anything in respect thereof. That is precisely this case, and GRANTHAM, J.,

A was right in holding that there had been no breach of the covenant to repair. This is a very clear case, and the tenant was not liable. The appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I agree.

B KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and will say a few words as to the law applicable to this case. In considering covenants of this kind, we must always consider what was contemplated by the parties. If the covenant in this case is in the widest terms, still, according to Payne v. Haine (3), regard must be had to the character of the house. As to this house, its character was this. Timber was laid upon mud, the solid ground being seventeen feet below the mud, and this timber formed the foundation of the house. It is said by the landlord that the only way to keep up this house was to underpin it. Would that be a "repairing" or "upholding" of this house within the meaning of the covenant? I think not. That would be making a different character of house. It has not been proved, or alleged, that by merely replacing the timber, the tenant could have made the house safe. In my opinion, to underpin this house would not be to "repair, uphold, or maintain" this house, which is of such a character, within the meaning of the covenant. Not to underpin was not, therefore, a breach of the covenant for which the landlords could maintain the action.

Appeal dismissed.

H The plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, paid for the defendant sums of money to certain persons, the names of whom, with the amounts to be paid to each, were on a slip of paper enclosed in a letter written by the defendant to the plaintiff. The sums were for bets on horse-races made and lost by the defendant to the persons named. In an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the sums so paid for the defendant at his request,

I Held: the payments made by the plaintiff were made "in respect of" agreements rendered null and void by the Gaming Act, 1845, and, therefore, by s. 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892, no action could be maintained for the recovery of the sums paid.

Appeal from an order of a master referred by CHARLES, J., to the court, upon the undertaking by the parties that the hearing of the appeal was to be treated as the hearing of the action. C

The action was brought to recover the sum of £148, being money paid by the plaintiff to the use of the defendant at his request, to certain persons named on the endorsement of the writ.

The plaintiff took out a summons for leave to sign judgment under Ord. 14. The master refused to give leave to sign judgment, and gave unconditional leave to defend. On appeal, the learned judge referred the summons to the court, both parties agreeing to treat the appeal as the final hearing of the action upon the facts stated in the affidavits. D

The material facts as set out in the affidavits were as follows:—On July 4, 1892, the plaintiff received from the defendant the following letter:

“Dear Mr. Tatam,—Kindly settle the enclosed account for me, as I don't know where to find all the men, and I have to catch an early train to Henley.—Yours truly, H. REEVE.” E

The account enclosed in this letter purported to show that the defendant was indebted to four persons in the respective sums set opposite their names, the sums amounting in all to £148, and the names of these persons and the sums paid to each were endorsed on the writ. The plaintiff paid the sums to these persons on the same day, and the sums were due from the defendant to the persons named in respect of bets on horse races, which the defendant had made and lost. The plaintiff in his affidavit stated that the amounts paid by him were not in respect of any bets made by him on behalf of the defendant, but that he simply paid them on the defendant's request contained in the letter of July 4, 1892, and that he was not in any way liable to pay them. The affidavits contained no statement that the plaintiff knew that the payments made by him were for bets, and the defendant in his affidavit merely set up as a defence the Gaming Act, 1892. F

By s. 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892:

“Any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Gaming Act, 1845, or to pay any sum of money by way of commission, fee, reward, or otherwise in respect of any such contract, or of any services in relation thereto or in connection therewith, shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money.” H

Bosanquet, Q.C., and Lynden Bell for the plaintiff.

Morton Daniel, for the defendant, was not called on to argue. I

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—I confess I have no hesitation at all in deciding this case, and it seems to me that judgment must be given for the defendant. If a person with full knowledge of what is called a debt of honour, chooses to trust another he must do so at his own risk, and with the knowledge that he must suffer if the person he has trusted chooses to repudiate his debt. The old Act—the Gaming Act, 1845—was discussed in Read v. Anderson (1) in which LORD ESHER,

A M.R., emphatically dissented from the other members of the court. In that case the Court of Appeal decided that when a commission agent was employed to make bets on behalf of his principal, and where it was admitted that if the bets had been made between principals only, the contracts would have been null and void under the statute, yet that an implied contract arose and could be enforced for repayment to the agent of the sums which the agent had paid for his principal. I entirely agree with the dissent of the Master of the Rolls in that case, for that decision really cut into the Gaming Act, 1845, as it was a decision that a person might do by means of another what he was prohibited from doing himself. However, that was the decision of the Court of Appeal, and that was an end of it.

There was an Act of Parliament passed in the present year to amend the Gaming Act, 1845, and this Act by s. 1 enacts that

C "Any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Gaming Act, 1845, or to pay any sum of money by way of commission, fee, reward, or otherwise in respect of any such contract, or of any services in relation thereto, or in connection therewith, shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money."

D The facts here are that the plaintiff was desired by the defendant to pay certain sums of money mentioned in a slip, and the plaintiff did so pay these sums, and, as a matter of fact, these sums were for bets made and lost by the defendant. It was argued that these sums were not paid in respect of bets. I cannot agree with that contention. True they were not paid "under" an agreement rendered null and void by the Gaming Act, 1845, as there was no betting between the plaintiff and the defendant, but they were paid "in respect of" these betting agreements. In respect of what were these payments made by the plaintiff except to discharge the sums which the defendant owed under these betting contracts? I decide this case with the less hesitation as I think the plaintiff was not ignorant of the purpose of these payments. If the plaintiff had been deceived into making payments in respect of a matter he knew nothing whatever about, one would have hesitated and been sorry to come to the conclusion to which I have come in this case. I think, however, that the plaintiff knew very well the nature of the transactions, and, therefore, he must take the risk of the defendant refusing to repay him the sums he has paid. I am of opinion, therefore, that there should be judgment for the defendant.

G WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The chief argument of the plaintiff's counsel was based on the assumption that the only object of the Gaming Act, 1892, was to get rid of the effect of the decision in Read v. Anderson (1). If that were the only object of the statute then it would not touch the present case, as the plaintiff here did not make the bets which he paid, and so the case is not the same as Read v. Anderson (1). During the argument I asked the learned counsel for the plaintiff what meaning was to be given to the words "in respect of," as well as the word "under," for the word "under" would have done, and would have been sufficient if the legislature had thought that the only object was to get rid of Read v. Anderson (1). The answer was given by both the learned counsel for the plaintiff that the words "in respect of" were equivalent to "under," and meant no more. I do not think that is so, and it must be that the words "in respect of" mean something different from the word "under." I do not think it makes any difference whether the plaintiff knew or did not know that these payments were for bets, because whether he knew or did not know they were equally made "in respect of" an agreement null and void by the Gaming Act, 1845. If the plaintiff had been misled by the defendant, then it might well be that the defendant would have been estopped from setting up this defence. It is not necessary to decide that point, as on reading the affidavits, I cannot doubt, and I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind, that the plaintiff knew what these payments were for. A

I think, therefore, that there must be judgment for the defendant.

Defect "in substance or in form"—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict., c. 43), ss. 1, 10.*

By the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 1, it was provided that no objection should be taken to any summons for an alleged defect in substance or in form. Section 10 provided that every complaint should be for one matter of complaint only, and not for two or more matters of complaint, and every information should be for one offence only, and not for two or more offences. E

The defendants were charged on one information and in one summons under the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849 (repealed), s. 3, with unlawfully using a place for the purpose of fighting two dogs, and with encouraging, aiding, and assisting at the fighting of such dogs. The objection was taken on behalf of the defendants that the summons was bad upon the ground that the complaint against them was for two matters of complaint. F

Held: the objection to the summons was for a defect in substance within s. 1 of the Act of 1848, and must be overruled. G

Notes. The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, was repealed by the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, the relevant provisions of ss. 1 and 10 of the 1848 Act being substantially re-enacted in s. 100 of the 1952 Act (32 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 501) and r. 14 (1) of the Magistrates' Courts Rules, 1952.

Case Stated by the stipendiary magistrate for the Wolverhampton and South Staffordshire District.

The defendants were on Oct. 20, 1891, charged before the magistrate, sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction at Wednesbury, on the prosecution of the inspector of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, for that

A they did,

"on the 4th day of September, 1891, at Darlaston, in the county aforesaid, unlawfully use a place, to wit, a room, at The Old George Inn, at Darlaston, for the purpose of fighting two dogs, and did encourage, aid, and assist at the fighting of such dogs."

B Objection was taken on behalf of the defendants at the commencement of the hearing that the information disclosed two offences, the first being under the first portion of s. 3 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849, and the second offence under the latter part of the same section, and that the learned magistrate had no power then to amend the summons, as by s. 14 every complaint must be made within one calendar month after the cause of complaint had arisen. The
C magistrate was of opinion that the offences charged were separate offences under s. 3, inasmuch as separate penalties were imposed for "using" a room, and "encouraging, aiding, etc.," at the fight, and that the information and summons were bad. He also refused to amend the information and summons, as that would practically be granting a new summons after the expiration of the limit imposed by s. 4. The prosecutor being dissatisfied with this determination, as being
D erroneous in point of law, duly applied to the magistrate in writing, on Oct. 27, 1891, to state a Case in writing for the opinion of the court whether the magistrate's decision was correct in law.

Colam for the prosecutor.

The defendants did not appear.

E HAWKINS, J.—I am of opinion that this case must go back to the magistrate, who should not have dismissed the complaint laid before him. The magistrate dismissed the case, upholding the objection which was raised on behalf of the defendants that the information disclosed two offences, and that he had no power to amend the summons, because every complaint under the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849, s. 3, must be made within one calendar month after the F cause of complaint has arisen.

In my opinion, the case comes within the provision of s. 10 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, which enacts that every complaint shall be for one matter of complaint only and not for two or more matters of complaint, and every information shall be for one offence only and not for two or more offences, and the fact of
G there being two offences charged in the information would make it bad if there were no further provision dealing with such a case. But s. 1 of the Act provides that no objection shall be taken to an information for any alleged defect therein. I should say that the objection taken to this information was an objection to an information for an alleged defect therein in substance within the meaning of the section, and the magistrate, if he had thought fit, could have adjourned the hearing
H of the case to some future day in order to give the defendants an opportunity of preparing their defence. But, it further seems to me to be good sense that, if a person is summoned for committing two offences, and takes objection to being tried for the two offences at the same time, the justices can remedy the defect by trying him for one offence and not taking any notice of the second charge against him.

Our attention has been called to Bartholomew v. Wiseman (1), in which it
I was held that an information was good which charged two different persons with separate offences, namely, one with causing cruelty to an animal, and the other with committing the cruelty. That decision certainly confirms the opinion which I hold that the magistrate was wrong in the present instance, and the case must be remitted back to him with this expression of our opinion.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The scheme of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, is quite plain. A summons is not to be got rid of merely because there is some mistake in substance or in form, but the justices are, if they think it necessary, to adjourn the case. But, on the other hand, if there is a substantial alteration in the charge the information may then be dismissed. The case must go back to the magistrate for him to deal with it upon its merits.

Case remitted.

Shipping—Collision—Defence—Inevitable accident—Burden of proof—Failure of steam steering gear.

The defendants' ship, which was fitted with steam steering gear, when under way in the Mersey in daylight collided with the plaintiffs' ship while she was at anchor. The defendants denied that the collision was caused by negligent navigation, but they alleged that, although the steering gear had been tried before the voyage and found to be in good order, it had failed to act because of some latent defect or obstruction which could not have been ascertained or prevented by the exercise of reasonable care or skill on their part and that the collision had been caused by inevitable accident. The evidence showed that the gear was good, that it had been overhauled by experts from time to time, that it had never failed to act before or since the accident, and that experts who had examined it since the collision had been unable to discover why it had failed to act on the occasion in question. Part of the chain forming part of the gear had been renewed before the voyage. The tendency of new chain to stretch was known to the defendants who had tightened it the day before the collision.

Held: the defendants having collided in daylight with a ship at anchor, the burden lay on them to prove inevitable accident, either by proving the cause of the accident and that its result was unavoidable, or by enumerating all the possible causes and proving that with regard to every one of them the result could not have been avoided; the defendants had not discharged this burden in that they had failed to show the cause of the accident or to enumerate all the possible causes; moreover on the evidence the possible cause was the stretching and consequent kinking of the new chain used in the gear; and, therefore, they were liable.

C Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of SIR CHARLES BUTT, P., in a collision action.

D A collision occurred about 10.30 a.m. on Mar. 4, 1891, in the river Mersey, between the plaintiffs' steamship, Catalonia, and the defendants' steamship, Merchant Prince. At the time of the collision the Catalonia, a steamship of 3,093 tons register, was at anchor in the Mersey, a little to the south of Tranmere Ferry. The wind was a fresh breeze from the North-West, the tide was low water slack and the weather fine and clear. The Merchant Prince, a steamship of 1,074 tons net, fitted with steam steering gear, while proceeding down the river ran into and damaged the Catalonia. The defendants did not charge the plaintiffs with negligence but they denied that the collision was caused or contributed to by the negligent navigation of the Merchant Prince. They alleged that those on board the Merchant Prince observed the Catalonia about a mile distant and about half point on the port bow of the Merchant Prince. As the Merchant Prince approached the Catalonia the pilot ordered the helm of the Merchant Prince to be ported, and shortly afterwards to be hard-a-ported, but it was found on trying to get the wheel over to port that the steering gear would not act, and although the engines of the Merchant Prince were at once put full speed astern, she came into collision with the Catalonia, the stem of the Merchant Prince striking the port quarter of the Catalonia. They further alleged that the steering gear of the Merchant Prince had been tried before she left her anchorage to proceed on the voyage, and found to be in good order; that it had failed to work because of some latent defect or obstruction which could not have been ascertained or prevented by the exercise of any reasonable care or skill on the part of the defendants, and that the collision and damage were caused by inevitable accident. The learned President dismissed the action, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Myburgh, Q.C., and A. D. Bateson for the defendants.

H LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the ship under way, which is a steamship, has collided with a ship which was at anchor. The ship which was at anchor sues the one which was under way, and which came into collision with her, in the Admiralty Court. The circumstances of the collision depend a good deal upon the place where it occurred. That place was the Mersey. They also depend upon the time when it occurred. Anyone who knows the Mersey will appreciate what it means when there is a north-westerly wind blowing nearly a gale. It means that there are a great many ships brought up in the river, and they are nearly all wind-rod; that is to say, that they are lying across the river just as this ship was. In such circumstances the Merchant Prince, which was above Liverpool, gets under way to go down the river. She was bound out to sea. Those in charge of her know what the state of the morning is, they know what the wind and stream are, and know that in all probability there will be a great many ships at anchor in the river. What are we told about this ship? She had come out of the Brunswick Dock the day before. She was fitted with machine steering gear, of which the chain is a very important part. This chain goes over a cog-wheel, and then, in order to take it to the stern of the ship to work the rudder, it goes round a leading wheel on each side of the ship. A

The ship had two other means of steering. There was a wheel underneath the bridge, and another wheel aft. She, therefore, had these three means of steering. The quickest working gear which was the patent was the most complicated, but was if feasible the most capable of the three, and in a river like the Mersey it would be the best. But unfortunately the chains, which as I said before are a very important part of the machinery, wear out, and want renewing. If you put new chains on they at first stretch. The chain goes over a cog-wheel, and then round the leading wheels. It must be clear to everybody that the chain must not be quite tight, or it will not work; neither will it work if it be too loose. Therefore, it must be known to all skilled seamen who have to deal with such matters that you must not make it quite tight, and must not make it too loose. B
But then there is another fact quite plain to anyone who thinks about it. If the chain is quite tight the links of the chain cannot kink—it is impossible. If you make it just as loose as these chains ought to be when in proper order, then they are not so loose as to cause the links to kink; but if you make them loose or leave the chain loose, and at the same time move it, then everybody must know that it is not an unlikely thing that the links will kink. If you try the experiment with your watch-chain what I mean is obvious, and we do not need experts to instruct us. C

That being the case, therefore, it would occur to any thinking man that if the chain is too tight it will not work; if I loosen it to the right amount it will work, but if I loosen it too much it will not work so quickly as it otherwise would, and the links may kink. There being a new chain on this ship, the master and officer would know, or ought to know, before they left Brunswick Dock that the links of this new chain would probably stretch on being used. What they ought to have expected did in fact happen. The links of the chain did stretch. I care not how much they stretched. They did stretch, and the officers of the ship by their conduct showed that this stretching ought to be remedied, because they tightened the chain up. Had they thought the matter out they would have said, "It is true we have tightened it up now, but it is liable to stretch, therefore it may stretch when going down the river, and if it does on such a morning as this, it will be awkward." I dare say they never thought about the kinking of the chain at all. What might they have done if they had thought the matter out? They might have said, "We will watch the chain, and if it stretches so as to seem loose, we will immediately stop the ship if necessary, and screw it up." D E F

But that is not all. It is said that they cannot use the wheel under the bridge without disconnecting it from the other. Very well then; if they cannot, why do not they disconnect it, and use that wheel as they go down the river? They were not obliged to use the patent wheel, and might have waited till they got outside the river before using it. They might also have stationed a man to watch the chain and disconnect the wheel if he saw the chain getting loose. Then again, there was the steering wheel aft. Why did they not have a man there so that, if anything happened, the ship could in a moment be steered by that wheel? That was not done. It is said that ordinary sailors would not think of these things; but these sailors, who, I have no doubt, were expert and skilful sailors, might have thought that there were means of taking that ship down the river without causing danger to other craft. G H

What has happened? This vessel while under way has run into a ship at anchor. It is said by counsel that I am about to change the law by what I am going to say. It has been laid down by this court that, where a ship under way runs into a ship at anchor; that is prima facie evidence of negligence on her part. The ship at anchor has only to state the fact, and that it was daylight; or, if it was night, she must show that her light was up and properly burning. That is all she has to say; the mere fact of the collision is evidence of negligence against the other ship. What is the reason for that? It is because after long experience I

A the courts have come to this conclusion, that as a matter of truth and fact the one ship ought to be under perfect command, and, therefore, able to get out of the way of the other ship, if she sees her, which is in a helpless state and can do nothing. The great object of the judges in Admiralty cases has been to lay down a plain rule to govern the acts of sailors, and not to have niceties of argument about what they are to do. The plain rule they have laid down is this: Unless

B you can get rid of it, it is negligence proved against you that you have run into a ship at anchor. They have used some variation of phraseology, but if you look into the cases you will find that the only way a man can get rid of liability for the accident, the circumstances of which prove negligence against him, is to show that it occurred by an accident which was unavoidable by him—that is, an accident the cause of which was such that he could not by any act of his have avoided the result. He can only get rid of that proof against him by showing inevitable accident; that is, by showing that the cause of the collision was a cause not produced by him, but a cause the result of which he could not avoid. Inevitable means unavoidable. Unavoidable means unavoidable by him.

That being so, there comes the proposition which LOPES, L.J., has put into form, that a man has got to show that the cause of the accident was a cause the result of which he

D could not avoid. If he cannot tell you what the cause is how can he tell you that the cause was one the result of which he could not avoid? That appears to me to be good reasoning. But when the defendants come to show the circumstances of this case they cannot show, they say, the cause of the accident, although the court can see a probable cause—I do not say it is clearly proved—and also means by which its result might have been avoided. Therefore, not only do the defendants not satisfy the burden

E which is upon them, but they have shown by evidence a probable cause, and have shown that, if that was the cause, there were means by which its result could without difficulty have been avoided. What was the cause, the probable cause? I do not say it is proved. Is there a probable cause? Yes, this chain refused to act. That must have been the reason why the wheel would not turn. It refused to act for a moment, and yet got right immediately after. If two of the

F links did kink as they went round the leading wheel, that would explain the accident. The gentlemen who advise us say that that is probably the way in which the accident happened, and that it was in all probability the cause of the accident. How did it happen? Why, because the chain became too loose. If that is so, is not that stretching of the chain a thing which the defendants could have foreseen, which they ought to have foreseen, and which, if they had foreseen

G—not that it would do it, but that it might do it—ought not they at the time in question to have taken means to have had the other steerages ready to act in a moment, even if they ought not to have used those other steerages, and those other steerages alone? It seems to me, from what one sees of the facts, that a probable cause is shown, and a cause the result of which could have been avoided.

But the defendants either have not shown any cause, and then they cannot have

H shown a cause the result of which was one that they could not avoid; or they have shown a probable cause, which, if it was the real cause as seems most likely, was one the result of which they could have avoided. I am of opinion, therefore, that we must disagree with the judge of the Admiralty Court, and hold that the defendants have not satisfied the burden of proof which lay upon them.

I FRY, L.J.—I find myself unable to agree with the decision of the judge. It is a case in which a ship in motion has run into a ship at anchor. In The Annot Lyle (1) it was laid down by LORD HERSCHELL that in such a case the cause of the collision might be an inevitable accident, but unless the defendants proved it to be so they were liable. The burden rests on the defendants to show inevitable accident. To sustain that the defendants must do one or the other of two things: they must either show what was the cause of the accident, and show that the result of that cause was inevitable; or they must show all the possible causes, one or other of which might produce the effect, and must further show with regard to every one of those possible causes that the result could not have been avoided. Unless they show one or other of these two things, it does not appear to me that they have established the plea of inevitable accident. In the present case the defendants have not shown the cause. They have left that entirely undecided. In fact, their evidence has largely gone to show that the event never did happen; but unfortunately for them it did happen. Nor have they enumerated all the causes which might have produced the effect, and shown that they were inevitable. In fact, it is impossible it seems to me, on the evidence before us, to enumerate what might have been the probable causes of this accident. How can we say? It may be that, if we knew its real cause, we should find some simple piece of negligence on the part of some of the defendants' servants in not doing something which would have avoided the collision. Therefore, on that simple ground the defendants fail in this case. A

But I go a step further. An inevitable accident is, according to the law laid down in The Marpesia (2), that which cannot be avoided by the exercise of ordinary care and caution and maritime skill. The cause of the present accident was one which probably might have been avoided. It appears to me that these people were using a new chain known to be likely to stretch, that it had stretched, and that it might easily kink or jam in one of the wheels. It follows that there was a danger which any person who had applied his mind to the matter might have avoided by the use of the hand-steering apparatus instead of the steam. If that was the state of things, it ought to have been avoided. I, therefore, feel myself unable to agree with the judge. B

LOPES, L.J.—In this case a moving vessel has come into collision with a vessel at anchor. As I understand it, the law is perfectly clear that in such circumstances the defendants are bound to show that what happened was inevitable. It is admitted that the defendants are unable to tell what the cause of the accident was, or how or why it happened. That being so, it cannot be said that they have discharged the burden cast upon them of showing that what happened was inevitable. Can they say that they could not avoid a thing when they do not know what the thing to be avoided was? I think not. In this case the steering gear failed. How is that to be accounted for? It appears to me that it can only be accounted for in two ways. It must have arisen from a defect in the machinery, or from bad management of the machinery. The defendants have not satisfied me that what happened did not proceed from the kinking of the chain. I rather think it did proceed from that cause. If that is so, how does the matter stand? The defendants were using a new chain, and they ought to have known that a new chain was liable to stretch. They ought to have known that a chain that stretched was liable to kink. Knowing these things, they ought to have provided against that which happened by being prepared to use one of the other of the modes of steerage with which they were supplied. In these circumstances I am unable to see that what happened was inevitable. I am unable to agree with the judge below, and I think the appeal ought to be allowed. C

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Cave and Vaughan Williams, JJ.), January 16, February 19, 1891]

[Reported [1891] 1 Q.B. 463; 60 L.J.Q.B. 244; 64 L.T. 115; 39 W.R. 399; 7 T.L.R. 296; 8 Morr. 30]

Bankruptcy—Discharge—Refusal—Re-consideration by court—Admissible evidence—Object of application to be enabled to appeal out of time—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict., c. 52), s. 104 (1).

Upon an application by a bankrupt for his discharge, if the judge is of opinion that the bankrupt is not entitled to an absolute order of discharge, and if the judge feels unable to fix a period of suspension, he may refuse the discharge, with liberty to the bankrupt to apply again, in which case the bankrupt can apply again as of right. The more convenient course to adopt is to refuse the discharge absolutely, in which case the bankrupt cannot apply again de novo as of right, but the judge can re-consider the refusal on an application to him, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 104 [now Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 108], to review, rescind, or vary his original order, if a prima facie case is made out. An application to review need not necessarily be founded on evidence which might have been before the court on the first application for a discharge. The general, though not the invariable, rule is that the court should not grant a re-hearing under s. 104 where the only object of the applicant is to obtain another opportunity for appealing when he has let the time for appealing from the original decision go by; but when the refusal of the discharge operates as a punishment, the punishment may be remitted at any distance of time if the object of the punishment has been effected.

H Appeal by a bankrupt against an order of the judge of the Liverpool County Court judge refusing his discharge.

The debtor and his brother carried on business as chemical brokers in Liverpool down to May, 1884, when they were adjudicated bankrupt, with joint debts amounting to £19,290, and assets £4,000, while there was on the appellant's separate estate a deficiency of about £1,500. In October, 1884, the appellant applied for his discharge, which was refused. On Oct. 17, 1890, a second application for his discharge was made by the appellant, and also an application for an order in the alternative reviewing the order of October, 1884. During the course of the hearing the counsel for the appellant abandoned the application for a review, and the application de novo for a discharge was refused, and this appeal was brought.

From October, 1884, down to October, 1890, the appellant had held various employments, and endeavoured to earn his living, had lived on a narrow income, and had incurred no debts, and had also received £2,680 under his mother's settlement, of which he told the official receiver.

Feb. 19, 1891. CAVE, J., read the following judgment of the court.—This was an appeal against an order of the county court judge of Liverpool refusing the bankrupt his discharge. The bankrupt and his brother traded as chemical brokers down to the summer 1884, when they were adjudicated bankrupt. The present appellant applied for his discharge in October, 1884, which was refused on Oct. 31, in that year. On Oct. 17, 1890, the appellant applied de novo to the court at Liverpool for an order of discharge, or in the alternative for an order reviewing the order of Oct. 31, 1884. In the course of the hearing the bankrupt's counsel abandoned the application for a review, and the application de novo for a discharge was refused.

C

This case raises for our determination the questions which were discussed but upon which no decision was given in Re Lloyd Ex parte Lloyd (1). I may say at once that I think the learned judge was right in regarding that case as no authority upon the point which alone came before him. When upon the hearing of the application of the bankrupt the judge is of opinion that the applicant is not entitled to an absolute order of discharge, and also feels himself unable to fix a period of suspension, he may, in refusing to grant a discharge, reserve liberty to the bankrupt to apply again, and if he does so the bankrupt may apply again in pursuance of the leave reserved as a matter of right; but having regard to the power of re-hearing hereinafter referred to, I think it would be more convenient that in such a case the judge should refuse the discharge absolutely.

Where the discharge is absolutely refused the bankrupt cannot apply de novo as a matter of right, as was sought to be done here, and in my opinion the learned judge was justified, after the abandonment of the application for a review, in making the order which he did make, and indeed I agree with him that he had no power to entertain the application; the refusal of Oct. 31, 1884, having been, as he says, an absolute refusal. Is then the position of a bankrupt, whose order of discharge has been refused and rightly refused on his first application, an utterly hopeless one, and must he, no matter how exemplary his subsequent behaviour, be compelled to go through the remainder of his life as an undischarged bankrupt? I should be very sorry to think that this was so, and agree with the learned judge of the county court that the refusal of a discharge is the very order above all others which may, with advantage, be considered after the lapse of time.

It appears to me that the power of re-considering an absolute refusal is conferred on the court by s. 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which provides that every court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under that Act may review, rescind, or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction. This section gives the court a discretion of the widest and most far-reaching character, and when properly exercised it is so beneficial in its operation and so calculated to advance the ends of justice that I think it ought not to be restrained by considering it in any niggardly spirit.

I

The general though not invariable rule has been laid down for guiding the court in the exercise of its discretion under this section, viz., that the court should not grant a re-hearing where the only object of the applicant is to obtain another opportunity for appealing from the decision of the judge when he has let the time for appealing from the original decision go by. The universal practice of fixing a limit of time on the power to appeal is derived from the general

A maxim interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium, and the maxim should not be extended beyond the limit of its utility. When litigants have gone to trial and the court has decided between them, it is inexpedient that the defeated party should be allowed to re-open the litigation at any distance of time when the position of the parties may have been materially affected by the lapse of time or the loss of material evidence. In such a case as this, however, when the refusal of

B the discharge operates as a punishment on the bankrupt, there can be no reason why the punishment should not be remitted at any distance of time, if it can be shown that the object of the punishment has been effected. No one is affected by the modification or remission of such an order except the bankrupt himself and to some extent society at large, which is benefited by the infliction of a punishment just in proportion to its justice and necessity, and is, therefore,

C injured and not benefited by the continuance of a punishment after the necessity for it has ceased.

I entertain no doubt that the judge was at liberty to hear an application to review the order of Oct. 31, 1884, if he thought a prima facie case was made out for such an indulgence. What then ought to be done in this case in which the application for a review was abandoned? We are told that it was abandoned

D because it was supposed (as it seems to me wrongly) that an application for a review could only be founded on evidence which might have been before the court on the original application. I see nothing at all in the section itself to warrant this limitation. If the counsel for the bankrupt thought that this was the conclusion to be drawn from any expressions of mine in Re Lloyd, Ex parte Lloyd (1), I regret that I should have expressed myself in a way capable of misconstruction.

E The learned judge seems to have discussed the merits of the case in order that we might consider it upon the merits if we were of opinion that he had power to hear the application, and, as I think he had the power to re-hear his former decision of Oct. 31, 1884, I do not see why we should not proceed to deal with the case at once, instead of sending the bankrupt to renew his application for a re-hearing, which would occasion considerable expense to all parties without any

F corresponding advantage.

The learned judge says he should have refused the application, even if he had thought he had the power to re-hear it, on the ground that the new facts did not bring the case (to use the judge's words) within the conditions sketched by me in Lloyd's Case (1). If the judge will look at that case again, I think he will see that I sketched no conditions whatever, but was simply giving an instance by way

G of illustration, and I should be very sorry to lay down beforehand the judge's discretion as to the circumstances which might seem to him sufficient to induce him to vary his refusal of the discharge.

In this particular case we are not informed which brother was the elder; but I think that, as counsel for the official receiver has suggested, we may not

H unfairly assume from the position of the names in the firm that the applicant was the younger, and we know that he had not been in difficulties before, as the other brother had been. His conduct since the bankruptcy appears, as the judge says, to have been creditable. He has worked hard, held some responsible positions, lived on a narrow income, and not incurred any debts. He has also rendered to the official receiver every assistance in getting for the creditors a

I sum of £2,680, which came to him under his mother's marriage settlement. It does not appear which of the brothers was the leading spirit in the partnership affairs, but at first, at all events, the present appellant seems to have been more moderate in his drawings than his brother.

Upon the whole, and having regard to the scale of punishment which has been adopted under the Act of 1883, I am of opinion that a suspension of the applicant's discharge for nearly seven years is a sufficient punishment, and that he should now have his discharge. As, however, the appellant has adopted the wrong mode of procedure, and only succeeds in getting his discharge by our indulgence, he must pay his own costs. The official receiver will take his costs out of the deposit. A

D Appeal by the defendants from a decision of the deputy judge in the Andover County Court in favour of the plaintiff for £22, the value of a horse which was poisoned by eating a yew tree growing on the defendants' land.

April 26, 1894. The following judgments were read.

CHARLES, J.—This was an appeal from a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff given at Andover County Court for £22, being the value of a colt of the plaintiff which was alleged to have been poisoned by eating the defendants' yew tree. The grounds of the appeal were, first, that there was no evidence to go to the F jury that the colt had in fact eaten of the yew tree of the defendants; and, secondly, that if there was, the colt had eaten the yew leaves under circumstances which entailed no legal liability on the defendants.

The plaintiff was a farmer, and occupied a field separated from the premises of the defendants by a fence. On the side of the fence next to the plaintiff's field was a ditch belonging to the defendants. On the defendants' land near the fence G grew a yew tree, the branches of which projected over the ditch, but not beyond it. They did not overhang the plaintiff's field. At the distance of about 120 yards grew another yew tree in the garden of one Hunt, which overhung the plaintiff's field, and in the hedge of the plaintiff's field, about fifty yards from the defendants' yew, there was a small yew bush. On June 25, 1893, the colt and several other horses were in the plaintiff's field. On June 26 the colt was H found dead five yards from the defendants' yew, and there was no doubt, from the examination made of the body, that it had died from eating yew leaves. All the three trees—the defendants', Hunt's, and the plaintiff's yew bush—presented appearances of having been recently eaten. A veterinary surgeon stated that it was a fact within his knowledge that horses have been known to walk a mile after eating yew before dying, and then to drop down dead. Such a case, however, I would be, he said, exceptional. The animal most often drops down dead directly after eating, or within a short distance.

Upon this evidence the judge was asked to direct a verdict for the defendants, on the ground that there was no evidence pointing to the colt having eaten of the defendants' yew. It was equally consistent, it was said, with the colt having eaten either of Hunt's yew tree or the plaintiff's yew bush. The judge, however, thought there was a case for the jury, and they found that the colt had eaten of the defendants' tree, and not of the other trees. I have, after some hesitation, come to the conclusion that there was some evidence to support this finding, having regard in particular to the evidence of the veterinary surgeon. The defendants' yew had been freshly eaten, and the most common case is that death ensues directly. The colt was found only five yards from the tree, and the two other possible causes of mischief were respectively 120 and fifty yards off.

This being the view I take of the evidence, it becomes necessary to consider the second point. The poisonous tree was admitted to be wholly on the defendants' land, but, inasmuch as it was so near to the boundary that an animal could easily reach the branches, it was contended that the principle of Fletcher v. Rylands (1) was applicable. But this argument appears to me to rest on a misconception of what that case really decided. The decision only refers to the escape from a defendant's land of something which he has brought there, and which is likely to do mischief if it escapes. In delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, BLACKBURN, J., laid down the true rule of law in words expressly approved and adopted in the House of Lords, as follows (L.R. 1 Exch. at p. 279):

"The person who for his own purposes brings on his land, and collects and keeps there, anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it in at his peril, and, if he does not do so, is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape."

Various illustrations are then given, in all of which the cause of offence was "not kept in" by the defendant. Thus the person whose grass is eaten by the escaping cattle of his neighbour, whose mine is flooded by water from his neighbour's reservoir, whose cellar is invaded by filth from his neighbour's privy, or whose habitation is made unhealthy by vapours from his neighbour's factory, has in each case legitimate ground of complaint. To use the language of the court in Tenant v. Goldwin (2) (1 Salk. at p. 361): "He whose dirt it is must keep it that it may not trespass."

Many other cases might be referred to illustrative of the rule. In all of them, however, it will be found that the noxious thing, be it "beasts, water, filth or smells," or what not, has somehow escaped from the defendant's land. Thus in Firth v. Bowling Iron Co. (3), the defendants' predecessors had fenced their land with wire rope, which the defendants allowed to remain. From long exposure the strands of the wire composing the rope became decayed, and pieces of it fell on the plaintiff's adjoining pasture. One of his cows swallowed a piece, and died in consequence. The defendant was held liable to compensate the plaintiff. So, again, where the defendants planted on their own land a yew tree which projected over the plaintiff's land, and the plaintiff's horse ate of it and died, the defendants were held liable: see Crowhurst v. Amersham Burial Board (4). On the other hand, in a case where the declaration merely charged that "the defendant was possessed of yew trees, the clippings of which he knew to be poisonous," it was held that such an allegation of fact did not support a duty to take care to prevent the clippings from being put upon his neighbour's land where horses and cattle might eat them: see Wilson v. Newberry (5).

The rule of law enunciated in Fletcher v. Rylands (1) I think therefore has no application, and I proceed to consider whether upon any other ground the defendant's liability can be made out. Can it be said that there is any duty on a man either not to grow a poisonous tree so near the boundary of his property as to be easily accessible to the stock of his neighbour, or, if he does so, to take precautions to prevent any danger to the stock arising? Here it must be remembered that no liability on the part of the defendants to fence against the cattle of his neighbour was proved. Had any such liability been shown to exist, and had the fence been defective, it might well have been found by the jury that the colt had obtained access to the defendants' land through breach of his obligation to fence, and, the poisonous tree being immediately within the fence, that the eating of its leaves by the colt was the natural consequence of the defendants' breach of duty; but, there being no liability on the part of the defendants to repair the fence, I do not see that they can be made responsible for the eating of these yew

A leaves by an animal which, in order to reach them, had come upon his land. The hurt which the animal received was due to his wrongful intrusion. He had no right to be there, and his owner therefore has no right to complain.

The true test in such a case is pointed out by GIBBS, C.J., in Deane v. Clayton (6) (7 Taunt. at p. 533), in a judgment which was emphatically approved by the Court of Exchequer in Jordin v. Crump (7), though on the facts proved in Deane v. Clayton (6) the court was equally divided as to what judgment should be entered. We must ask, he says, in each case, whether the man or animal which suffered had or had not a right to be where he was when he received the hurt. If he had not, then—unless, indeed, the element of intention to injure, as in Bird v. Holbrook (8), or of nuisance, as in Barnes v. Ward (9), is present—no action is maintainable.

C It was, however, urged that there was here something in the nature of a nuisance, and that the growing of this yew tree so near the boundary was actionable in case damage was caused by it, on the same ground as that on which Townsend v. Wathen (10) was decided. It was there held that if a man places traps baited with flesh on his own ground so near to the premises of another that dogs kept on his neighbour's premises must probably be attracted by their instinct into the traps, and if in consequence his neighbour's dogs are so attracted and are injured, D an action lies. But no evidence whatever was offered in this case that the yew trees could be regarded as a trap in this sense to the plaintiff's horses, and, in the absence of any such evidence, it was, I think, the plaintiff's business to keep his horses from going too near the tree, and not the defendants' duty to take any precautions against their doing so. In the result, therefore, I think that this appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants with costs.

E HENN COLLINS, J.—I agree entirely with CHARLES, J. The yew tree in question was wholly within the defendants' boundary; therefore it seems clear that the principle of which Fletcher v. Rylands (1) is an instance has no application to this case. The principle there stated (L.R. 1 Exch. at p. 279) was that:

F "The person who for his own purposes brings on his land and collects and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes must keep it in at his peril."

That case, as is pointed out by MELLOR, J., in Wilson v. Newberry (5) was decided on the analogy of Tenant v. Goldwin (2) (1 Salk. at p. 361), where it was said: "He whose dirt it is must keep it that it may not trespass." Here there has been no escape or trespass of anything kept by the defendants, and, if they are liable at G all, it must be for not taking precautions to prevent the plaintiff's cattle from getting access to the defendants' yew tree on the defendants' own premises—in other words, for negligence. I should add that there was no evidence of any obligation on either party to maintain the fence for the benefit of the other, and the case may be treated, therefore, as if there had in fact been no fence.

H What, then, was the duty cast upon the defendants the breach of which grounds this action? Counsel for the plaintiff contended that the owner of anything capable of attracting cattle and dangerous to them if they yielded to the attraction was bound to use reasonable care to prevent them getting access to it. Does such a duty exist? I think not; and counsel was not able to produce any authority which went near to establish it. The point might have arisen in Crowhurst v. Amersham Burial Board (4). There a horse had died from eating of a yew tree I growing on defendant's land, and the Case as originally stated by the county court judge left it doubtful whether the death was caused by eating portions of tree which projected over the plaintiff's land, or portions on the defendant's own land which the horse was able to reach by stretching its neck over the intervening fence. The court, however, sent the Case back to be re-stated, and it was then found as a fact that the horse died exclusively from the effects of eating portions which projected over the plaintiff's land, and the Case was accordingly decided in favour of the plaintiff on the authority of Fletcher v. Rylands (1). The court, therefore, evidently thought that different considerations might apply to the two sets of facts.

Again, in Firth v. Bowling Iron Co. (3), it was not suggested that liability could be established if the cattle had died from eating wire which had fallen on the defendant's side of the fence, and this case also was brought under Fletcher v. Rylands (1). What, then, are the duties towards strangers of a man who keeps a dangerous thing on his own ground? There was not much evidence on the point, but it was assumed in argument, and I treat it as established, that a yew tree is a dangerous thing—i.e., it may be injurious if eaten by horses. It is, however, lawful and usual, as pointed out by KELLY, C.B., in Crowhurst v. Amersham Burial Board (4), to plant yew trees near fences. Though possibly dangerous, therefore, under some circumstances, there is nothing unlawful in a yew tree so planted. Further, the danger, such as it is, is obvious; it does not constitute a trap. Is the person who keeps such a thing upon his own land liable to a stranger for loss happening to the cattle of the latter while straying on such person's land without his permission? It seems quite clear on the authorities that he is not. Jordin v. Crump (7) is decisive on this point. There the facts admitted on demurrer were that, while the plaintiff was walking on a public footpath running across the defendant's close, his dog in chasing a rabbit on the defendant's land ran against a dog spear concealed in the bushes not far from the path and was killed. The plaintiff had notice of the existence of dog spears on the defendant's ground. ALDERSON, B., in giving the judgment of the court in favour of the defendant, adopts the reasoning of GIBBS, C.J., in Deane v. Clayton (6). He says (8 M. & W. at p. 788):

"The present case is much stronger than that, for here the plaintiff had express notice that dog spears were set in the wood, though, were this even otherwise, our decision would still be in favour of the defendant on the short ground that the setting of them was a lawful act, and the accident occasioned by them was the act of the dog, not of the defendant, and that the plaintiff was bound to keep his dog on the footpath."

Unless the fact that the yew tree was close to the fence makes a difference, this authority seems conclusive that the defendants are not liable, if the yew tree be regarded merely as a dangerous thing, like a dog spear, not having in itself the additional element of tempting a trespasser. It seems quite clear, however, that the principle cannot be affected by the distance from the defendants' boundary. It was the duty of the plaintiff to keep his horse from trespassing, and not of the defendants to guard against the consequences of such trespass. Such duty is clear, and the plaintiff might have been liable to the defendants, for damage done by his horse, while so trespassing, to the land of the latter: see Cox v. Burbidge (11); Ellis v. Loftus Iron Co. (12). Does it, then, make any difference that a yew tree is likely to tempt a horse to trespass? I think not, unless it were proved that it was put or kept there for the purpose of enticing the animal to his destruction, as was done in Townsend v. Wathen (10). The wrongful intention was the gist of that action. If such intention is disproved, it follows, if the above reasoning is correct, that there can be no liability. Indeed, the very point is put as an illustration by GIBBS, C.J., in Deane v. Clayton (6), where he takes the case of water in which a plaintiff has no right polluted by the act of the defendant and drunk by the plaintiff's cattle, who reach it through a trespass on the defendant's land. He says (7 Taunt. at pp. 531, 532):

"Their right to be there is the gist of the action, and in no instance has such an action been supported where cattle had no right to be in the place in which they received the damage unless the defendant had used some undue means to entice them thither, as in Townsend v. Wathen (10), which stands upon a distinct ground."

It is obvious that water might have just as great an attraction for cattle as a yew tree.

The result may be summarised by saying the action is one of negligence, and the possession of something attractive and injurious to cattle casts no duty on

A the owner to take precautions against their trespassing in pursuit of it when he has not placed or kept it there with that purpose. As already pointed out, a yew tree near a fence is a lawful and usual thing, and it would be strange if the owner should find himself fixed with varying obligations in respect thereof according to the varying uses to which the adjoining owner chose to put his land.

B Lastly, it was suggested that the analogy of such a case as Lynch v. Nurdin (13) might apply, and that as in that case a defendant who had left his cart and horse in a highway where he had a right for the time being to place them was held liable for injury to a child who trespassed upon it in his absence, so here the defendants might be liable for not taking precautions to prevent the horse getting access to the tree. The cases, however, differ in a crucial point. There the cart was left in a public highway, where the children and the plaintiff had an equal right to be; and the children were not trespassers before they got into the cart. C If the plaintiff had licensed the defendants to carry his yew tree across the plaintiff's field, and the defendants while doing so had left it unguarded, and while so left the horse had eaten it, the cases would be more nearly parallel. So of the case put during the argument, of a poisonous drug exposed in a very tempting shape in an open shop-front beside a highway within reach of a child, who, being tempted, D ate it and was injured. If an action could be maintained in such a case, it would, I think, be only on the analogy of those cases which decide that the person who makes or keeps a pitfall so near the highway as to be a danger to persons passing along it is responsible in damages to a passenger along the highway who accidentally falls into it (see Barnes v. Ward (9)), the child obeying its instinct being regarded as in the same position as a person who without negligence falls off the highway E into the pitfall. Those cases rest on the special duty incident to the occupation of property adjoining a highway, and have no application to a case where the question is merely between the occupiers of adjoining land; and, even if the duties were identical, the danger in the illustration is concealed, while in the case of the yew tree it is obvious. I think, therefore, that judgment ought to be entered for the defendants.

A covenant not to sue one of two joint tortfeasors does not release the other.

The plaintiff had the sole right to present a certain play. To raise money for charity, W. employed the defendant to arrange for a company to act the play, but he omitted to pay for the plaintiff's licence permitting that to be done. When this was discovered it was arranged between the plaintiff's solicitors and W. that W. should be discharged from any liability he had incurred on payment of two guineas. The plaintiff's solicitors wrote to W. acknowledging the receipt of that sum "in full discharge of your personal liability," and stating that that was without prejudice to the plaintiff's claim against the defendant. In an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant the defendant alleged that the letter amounted to a release of W., and, as a joint tortfeasor with him, she was also released.

Held: the letter amounted to a covenant not to sue A. and not to a release, and, therefore, the defendant was not entitled to release.

Appeal from a decision of DAY, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiff had the sole liberty of representing a play called "Our Boys," and brought the present action against the defendant for a penalty or for damages under the Dramatic Copyright Act, 1833 [repealed], for representing the play, or causing it to be represented, without the plaintiff's consent in writing first had and obtained. The Rev. Freeman Wills, in order to raise money for charitable purposes, employed the defendant, Miss Mayeu, to arrange for a company who should act a play at Wandsworth Town Hall. He hired the room, published bills advertising the performance, and took the money at the doors, while the defendant made all the necessary arrangements for the acting of the play by the company and herself, for which she was paid three guineas. The defendant went to see the plaintiff's theatrical agent, and it was agreed that one guinea was to be paid

A by Mr. Wills for the plaintiff's licence to act the play of "Our Boys." Mr. Wills accidentally omitted to pay the guinea, and the plaintiff's licence was never given. The play was acted on Jan. 23, 1891, and after the performance it was discovered that the guinea had not been paid and that the plaintiff's licence had not been obtained. The plaintiff's solicitor wrote to Mr. Wills and demanded payment of five guineas, but it was afterwards arranged between them that on payment by B Mr. Wills of two guineas he should be discharged from any liability he had incurred through the performance of the play. Mr. Wills sent to Mr. Tilson, the plaintiff's solicitor, a cheque for two guineas, and in reply received the following letter :

C "To the Rev. Freeman Wills, 28, Sun Street, Finsbury Square, April 10, 1891.—Dear Sir,—'Our Boys'—I beg to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 9th, with cheque for £2 2s. enclosed in respect of fee and costs in full discharge of your personal liability in connection with Miss Marie Mayeu's performance of above at Wandsworth Town Hall, on Jan. 23, 1891. This is of course without prejudice to my client's claim against Miss Mayeu.—Yours faithfully, W. M. Tilson."

D At the trial of the action, before DAY, J., without a jury, the learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for forty shillings. The defendant appealed.

Morton Smith for the plaintiff.

E July 25, 1892. A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment of the court.—The first point for determination is, whether the defendant has established her defence, that the plaintiff had released her joint tortfeasor, the Rev. Mr. Wills, from a joint cause of action so as to release her therefrom, or whether what she has established is merely that the plaintiff had covenanted not to sue Mr. Wills.

F It is, we think, clear law, that a release granted to one joint tortfeasor, or to one joint debtor, operates as a discharge of the other joint tortfeasor or the other joint debtor, the reason being that the cause of action, which is one and indivisible, having been released, all persons otherwise liable thereto are consequently released. Cocke v. Jennor (1) is distinct upon the point, and there are many subsequent cases to the same effect. It has also been held that a covenant not to sue one of two joint debtors does not operate as a release of the other joint debtor (Hutton v. Eyre (2)), the reason being that the joint action is still alive. We have found no case in which it has been held that a covenant not to sue releases a joint tortfeasor; and in our judgment the principle upon which it has been held that such a covenant does not release a joint debtor applies to the case of a joint tortfeasor.

G The question then is, does the document of April 10, 1891, operate as a release of the joint cause of action against Mr. Wills and the defendant, or only as a covenant not to sue Mr. Wills? It is as follows: [Hrs LORUSHIP read the letter written by Mr. Tilson, the plaintiff's solicitor, and continued:] A rule of construction for such a document was laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench in Price v. Barker (3), where it was held that, in determining whether the document be a release or a covenant not to sue, the intention of the parties was to be carried out, and, if it were clear that the right against a joint debtor was intended to be preserved, inasmuch as such right would not be preserved if the document were held to be a release, the proper construction, where this was sought to be done, was that it was a covenant not to sue, and not a release. In Bateson v. Gosling (4) at nisi prius the same canon of construction was applied, and it was held that, the release being, as it was, limited by a proviso reserving rights against the surety, it must be taken that it was a covenant not to sue, and not a release; and this ruling was unanimously upheld by the Court of Common Pleas. For these reasons I we are of opinion that the document of April 10, 1891, is a covenant not to sue, and is not a release of the joint cause of action, and that the defendant's defence fails in fact. In our judgment this appeal must be dismissed, and with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

C Application by the plaintiffs for a new trial.

The action was brought upon a joint and several promissory note by the payee against one of the makers who had signed it as a surety. The defendant pleaded that at the time he signed the note he was incapacitated by insanity from understanding what he was doing, and that this insanity was known to the plaintiffs.

D At the trial before DENMAN, J., with a jury, the learned judge left two questions to the jury: (i) whether the defendant when he signed the note was so insane as to be incapable of understanding what he was doing; and (ii) whether this incapacity was known to the agent of the plaintiffs who was present when the note was signed. The jury found that the defendant was insane when he signed the note, but could not agree as to the knowledge of the plaintiff's agent. Upon this finding DENMAN, J., gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiffs now

Channell, Q.C., and Le Riche for the plaintiffs.

Witt, Q.C., and G. A. Scott for the defendant.

F LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case DENMAN, J., has ordered judgment to be entered for the defendant on the finding of the jury in answer to the first question put to them, and if we disagree with him as to the effect of that finding our only course will be to order a new trial.

The action is brought upon a promissory note signed by the defendant as surety, and his defence is that he was so insane at the time he signed the note as to be incapable of understanding what he was doing. The jury have found that that was a fact. In addition to that the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff knew that the defendant was in that state, and on that point the jury were unable to agree. The question, therefore, for our decision is whether the latter allegation was a necessary part of the plea, and, if so, on whom the burden of proof lies. I shall not go through all the cases from the beginning, but, as I think it would be well for this court to lay down an absolute rule, I will state my view of what is the result of all the cases. It is this. When a person enters into an ordinary contract, and afterwards alleges that he was so insane at the time he did so that he did not know what he was doing, though he proves that to be so, the contract is as binding on him in every respect and to every extent as if he had been fully sane, unless he also prove that, at the time of making the contract, the person he contracted with knew him to be so insane as not to know what he was

G doing. For many years it has been the law that a plea that the defendant was so insane at the time of entering into the contract that he did not know what he was doing has been held not to be a good plea, unless there was an averment of the plaintiff's knowledge of this insanity of the defendant. The necessity of this last averment could not be supported unless the law is what I have stated. The defendant must prove, besides the fact of his insanity, the fact that the plaintiff knew of it. The jury therefore in this case having disagreed and given no finding on a material part of the defendant's plea, the case must go back for

H a new trial.

FRY, L.J.—I am unable to agree with the ruling of DENMAN, J., in this case. A
The law of England on this point is very old. LITTLETON, in his treatise on TENURES, says, in s. 405 that a man shall not be received to say that he was not of sane memory at the time of such descent, etc.,

“pur ceo que nul home de pleine age serra resceive en ascun plee per la ley a destultifer et disabler le person demesne.” B

Again, in the well-known Beverley's Case (1), before the King's Bench, it was laid down (4 Co. Rep. at p. 1236):

“that every deed, feoffment, or grant, which any man non compos mentis makes, is avoidable, and yet shall not be avoided by himself, because it is a maxim in law that no man of full age shall be in any plea to be pleaded by C him, received by the law to stultify himself,” and reference was made to LITTLETON'S TENURES. FITZHERBERT had before that taken a different view in NATURA BREVIIUM, but his view was held not to be law in Stroud v. Marshall (2). COKE refers to FITZHERBERT'S opinion, but he adopts that of LITTLETON, saying (Co. Lit. at p. 247b):

“and LITTLETON here is of opinion that neither by plea, nor by writ, nor otherwise, he himselfe shall avoid it, but his heire (in respect his ancestor was non compos mentis) shall avoid it by entrie, plea, or writ. And herewith the greatest authorities of our books agree; and so it was resolved with LITTLETON in Beverley's Case (1), where it is said that it is a maxim of the common law that the partie shall not disable himselfe.” D

Therefore, although in certain cases the Crown, and in other cases persons claiming under one who was non compos mentis, might set up a man's mental incapacity, the man could not do so himself. E

In Molton v. Camroux (3) POLLOCK, C.B., says (2 Exch. at p. 502):

“On looking into the cases at law we find that in Browne v. Jodrell (4) LORD F
TENTERDEN says:

“I think the defence [of unsoundness of mind] will not avail, unless it be shown that the plaintiff imposed on the defendant.”

In Baxter v. Earl of Portsmouth (5) ABBOTT, C.J., with the concurrence of the rest of the court, laid down the same doctrine. In Dane v. Viscountess Kirkwall (6) G
PATTESON, J., in directing the jury, said (8 C. & P. at p. 685):

“It is not sufficient that Lady Kirkwall was of unsound mind, but you must be satisfied that the plaintiff knew it and took advantage of it.”

On the old rule, therefore, has been engrafted this exception, that, when a defendant can show himself to have been non compos mentis at the date of the contract, and can show also that the plaintiff knew of this fact, then, and then only, he can avoid his contract. That is the only exception to the old rule, as is shown by Molton v. Camroux (3). In this case, therefore, the defendant has not proved his defence, and, as we cannot order judgment to be entered for the plaintiff upon the only finding of the jury, we must order a new trial. H

LOPES, L.J.—The result of the authorities on this branch of law may, I think, be summed up thus. A contract made by a person of unsound mind is not voidable at that person's option if the other party to the contract believed at the time he made the contract that the person with whom he was dealing was of sound mind.
In order to avoid a fair contract on the ground of insanity the mental incapacity of the one must be known to the other party. A defendant must plead and prove both his insanity and the knowledge of the plaintiff; the burden of proof of both I those facts lies on the defendant. As he has not done so in this case, we must send it for a new trial.

New trial ordered.

LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK v. SIMMONS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lord Watson, Lord Herschell, Lord Macnaghten and Lord Field), December 14, 15, 17, 1891, April 4, 1892]

Negotiable Instrument—Bearer bond—Bonds of foreign bank—Coupons payable to bearer—Passing by delivery on Stock Exchange.

The respondent, who was a customer of a firm of stockbrokers, H. D. & Co., had left in the hands of D. for safe custody bonds of the Buenos Aires Land Mortgage Bank, of the value of 15,000 dollars. These bonds had attached to them coupons which were payable to bearer, they passed by delivery on the Stock Exchange, and they were dealt with by the bank as negotiable instruments. On Oct. 12, 1887, D., without authority from the respondent, in order to raise money for his own purposes, sold the respondent's bonds. On Oct. 28 he re-purchased similar bonds of equal value, which were entered in the books of the firm as being the property of the respondent. On the same day he deposited the bonds, with other securities, at the appellant bank as security for a loan to himself, out of which he paid for the bonds so purchased. In June, 1888, H. D. & Co. became insolvent, and the bank, who had retained the bonds in their possession up to that time, sold them, to repay themselves for the loan to D. In an action by the respondent against the bank to recover the bonds or their value,

Held: the bonds were negotiable instruments; when they were pledged with the bank there was, on the evidence, no circumstance to put the bank on inquiry regarding the transaction and so the bank took the bonds in good faith as well as for value; accordingly, the bank had obtained a valid title to the bonds, and the respondent's action must fail.

Appeal by the defendants, the London Joint Stock Bank, from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY, BOWEN, and FRY, L.JJ.) reported [1891] 1 Ch. 270, H affirming a decision of KEKEWICH, J.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., Finlay, Q.C., and Rawlins for the bank.

Rigby, Q.C., Warmingtton, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

April 4, 1892. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I believe this case, when it is examined carefully, raises no question of law, though doubtless some questions raised in other cases seem at first sight to be touched by it. There is no doubt that the property which is the subject of debate (the character and quality of which I will discuss later) was at one time the property of the plaintiff. There is no doubt that the plaintiff, having left this property in the hands of a person named Delmar, one of the members of the firm of Herapath, Delmar & Co., merely for safe custody, gave

A no authority, express or implied, to Delmar to dispose of it, and there is no doubt that unless that property has been changed it is still the property of the plaintiff, and ought to be restored to him. I prefer stating the proposition in this form because, though the disposal of one set of bonds, and the re-purchase of others in their place, and their suggested appropriation as substitutes for those unlawfully disposed of, raises another question, it appears to me that the same question
B would arise in a much simpler form, but subject to precisely the same principles of law, in the form which I have suggested. Applying myself, therefore, to the simple form in which I have suggested that the question might be raised, the first point relied on is that the property in question is, according to the law merchant, negotiable, and if passed over, even by a person who had no title, to one who received for value, in good faith, and without knowledge of the want of title in
C his predecessor in title, a good title is made by such transfer to the innocent holder for value.

If the facts support this proposition it cannot be doubted, but first, as to the character and quality of the property itself. It consists of bonds known as "Cedulas." It seems to me here impossible to dispute that the bonds in question were negotiable instruments. I should have thought so upon the evidence, and D after the decision of your Lordships' House in Goodwin v. Roberts (2). But I should equally think so here from the course pursued at the trial. I take the statement of the facts from the judgment of BOWEN, L.J., who said ([1891] 1 Ch. at p. 294):

"An admission was made at the trial to the effect that these bonds were commonly transferred from hand to hand by delivery, and this must be taken
E to be true. But the admission was carefully limited, and still left uncovered the question whether they are negotiable instruments in the sense in which bills of exchange and promissory notes are negotiable so that delivery by a person who has no title confers, nevertheless, a title on a bona fide holder for value without notice. We should require either a more unqualified admission or else more conclusive evidence before we could accept the view that bonds
F like these had become part of the currency of this country so as to have acquired the peculiar characteristics of a completely negotiable instrument. The appellants' counsel alleged that they had been misled at the trial by the form of the admission, and asked that, before we decided the case on the hypothesis that these bonds were not completely negotiable, an issue might be directed to try that question. For fear of a miscarriage of justice, we will, therefore,
G assume in the appellants' favour and for the purpose of this case only that the documents in question had been proved to be completely negotiable instruments."

It is, to my mind, clear, therefore, that your Lordships, if any doubt remained on the question whether these bonds were or were not negotiable in the true
H commercial sense of the term, could not decide this case without directing an issue such as the appellants' counsel demanded; in the event of your Lordships considering that the evidence and admission made at the trial of what is after all in each case a question of fact, were insufficient, it would be impossible to decide adversely to the appellants. For my own part, I do not see how, after the evidence and the admission made at the trial, it is possible to suggest that that I matter of fact is left in doubt.

The remaining part of the proposition is, as I have said, equally a question of fact. Did the bankers receive these bonds in good faith, and, though it is almost involved in that proposition, without any reason to suppose that the person from whom they received them had no right to so dispose of them? I am of opinion that they did. There is not, to my mind, the least reason to suppose that the bank did not take these bonds in the ordinary course of business, and with a full belief that the person from whom they received them was either the owner or had full authority to deal with them.

The Court of Appeal appear to have been much influenced by the decision of your Lordships' House in Earl of Sheffield v. London Joint Stock Bank, Ltd. (1). The first observation that I would make is that if, as I believe, it be accurate that the question is one which is to be determined upon the facts of the case, no one case can be an authority for another. The only question of law decided in the Earl of Sheffield's Case (1) was that a purchaser, even for value, cannot insist on his purchase if he knows that the person from whom he purchases has no right to sell—no very novel principle of law, nor one upon which I should think much doubt could exist. The second observation I make is that in this case the claim is to take from the bankers the securities they have received without paying what had been advanced upon them. In the Earl of Sheffield's Case (1) no one doubted that the bankers were entitled to receive the amount which had in fact been authorised by the owner of the securities to be raised upon them. But the cardinal distinction between the two cases is that in this case, upon the facts proved, I am of opinion that the bankers were under the full belief and conviction that the bonds were being lawfully dealt with, whereas in the Earl of Sheffield's Case (1) I thought (and I believe those of your Lordships who were parties to that judgment thought also) that the bank had actual knowledge that the person pledging them had only a limited authority to raise money upon them. And although it was also considered that the bank sincerely believed that, as a matter of law, that gave them a right to hold the securities for advances made beyond that limited amount, your Lordships held that the mistake of the bankers as to the matter of law did not cure the effect of their knowledge of the fact that the person to whom they advanced the money was exceeding the limit of his authority. In expressing my opinion in the Earl of Sheffield's Case (1) I said (13 App. Cas. at p. 341):

"But I do not believe Mozley's business could have lasted a month if the banks had not allowed this system to continue by exchanging securities. Mozley was, as he says himself, entitled to pledge them to the extent to which he had advanced money upon them, and the conclusion I draw from the facts proved is that the banks knew very well the system of money-lending pursued by Mozley, and trusted to him that he would not over-pledge, so to speak, the securities of his customers. Otherwise the very first security refused to Mozley's customer upon his tendering the amount advanced upon it, would have brought the whole business to a very speedy end. If this is the true view of the facts, it is impossible to contend that the bank is entitled to the position of purchasers for value without notice. I think they had actual knowledge, but if they had reason to think that the securities might be Mozley's own, or might belong to somebody else, I think they were bound to inquire."

LORD WATSON said (ibid. at p. 343):

"In my opinion the character of the transactions between the respondents and Mozley was, of itself, sufficient to notify to them that his interest was limited. The bank officials, when examined before the judge of first instance, substantially admitted that they knew that the bulk of the securities lodged by Mozley were those of his customers; and apart from the admission, it is a matter of plain inference that they must have had that knowledge."

LORD MACNAGHTEN said (ibid. at p. 348):

"The banks knew that the person who dealt with them as owner was not acting by right of ownership."

LORD BRAMWELL, though he was careful to disclaim an absolutely accurate definition of what was notice of the infirmity of the title, indicated, in his opinion (ibid. at p. 346), that at the same time the banks lent their money, they had

"notice of the infirmity of the pledgor's title or of such facts and matters as made it reasonable that inquiry should be made into such title."

A He added that the definition was probably incomplete, but sufficient for the case he was then deciding.

Assuming all your Lordships who were parties to that decision to have been right in your view of the facts, and I certainly see no reason to doubt the conclusion at which I, in common with your Lordships arrived, it is obvious to ask: What new principle of law is it possible to suggest was there laid down? It is manifest
B there was none. When I turn from the facts proved in the Earl of Sheffield's Case (1) to the case now before your Lordships (although I must make a protest that it is not a very profitable inquiry to consider whether one case resembles another in its facts), I am of opinion that every one of the elements relied upon in that case to show the knowledge of the bank of the infirmity of the title is absent here. I can find no trace of any such course of business brought home to the knowledge
C of the bankers as would give them the least suspicion that their clients had not full authority to deal as they were dealing with the securities in their hands. I observe the question was plainly put by counsel for the bank to one of the witnesses, who was asked whether there was a custom on the Stock Exchange for brokers to make one client's bonds or stocks security for another client's debt, and the answer was—No. It was then put that if the securities of ten clients were
D brought en bloc to the bank to borrow £10,000, the effect might be to make one client's property the security for money borrowed for another; the witness disclaimed any suspicion of any such transaction, and I confess I cannot share the view that KEKEWICH, J., took of the re-examination. Counsel for the respondent asked, in substance, whether the banks did not suppose that they were dealing with honest men, obviously suggesting, to my mind, that it would be dishonest for
E Mr. A. to make Mr. B. security for Mr. A.'s loan. KEKEWICH, J., seems to have been under the impression that relying on the broker's honesty did not alter the result. But, to my mind, it makes the whole difference. If there are £10,000 borrowed, and ten different clients' securities, what is there to tell the bank, or to suggest to the bank, that the ten clients had not each either a joint interest in the £10,000, or a several interest, which their several property justifies the broker
F in pledging? I do not, of course, mean to suggest any such mental process on the part of the broker as that he should be supposed to be appropriating only such part of the deposited securities as would properly be pledgeable to each individual customer, but what appears to me very clear is that there is nothing in the nature of the transaction, nothing in the position of broker and customer respectively which makes it a reasonable inference that the broker was exceeding his authority, or, indeed, that there was anything which could be reasonably supposed to raise
G a doubt on the subject.

The inferences derived from the business carried on by the money-lender in the Earl of Sheffield's Case (1) were peculiar to that case, and have no relation to the course of business which brokers habitually pursue towards their own clients, and for their own clients, when dealing with bankers with whom they deposit
H securities. The deposit of securities as "cover" in a broker's business is as well known a course of dealing as anything can possibly be, and the phrase that they are deposited en bloc seems to be somewhat fallacious. That they are, in fact, deposited by the broker at one time, and to raise one sum, may be true. It does not follow, and I do not know that the banker could reasonably be expected to presume that they belonged to different customers, and that the limit of the
I broker's authority was applied to each individual security by his own client. It would, therefore, to my mind, be as totally different from the facts proved or inferred in the Earl of Sheffield's Case (1) as anything could well be. I do not think that in that case any countenance was given to the notion that because Mozley, the money-lender, was assumed to be the agent for the owners of the property, that circumstance alone put the bank upon inquiry as to his title to the property with which he dealt. To lay down as a broad proposition that in every case you must inquire whether a known agent has the authority of his principal would undoubtedly be a startling proposition, and certainly nothing said in the

Earl of Sheffield's Case (1) could justify so novel an idea. The broad proposition laid down by ABBOTT, C.J., in Gorgier v. Mieville (3) (3 B. & C. at p. 47) that a negotiable instrument by delivery to any person holding it gives a good title to any person honestly acquiring it, seems to me to be decisive of this case. The property in question, for reasons I have already given, was, or must be presumed to be, negotiable. I think there was nothing in the evidence to raise a doubt that it was honestly acquired by the bank, and I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed. A B

LORD WATSON.—I concur in the opinion which has been read by the Lord Chancellor, and I shall endeavour to state shortly the considerations which induce me to differ from the decision of the Court of Appeal.

In the court below, as at your Lordships' Bar, three questions were discussed. Were the Cedula bonds for 15,000 dollars, deposited by Delmar with the appellant bank, on account of his firm, the property of the respondent? Were those bonds negotiable instruments? Lastly, if the bonds belonged to the respondent, and were negotiable, is the bank, in a question with the respondent, entitled to retain them? I am prepared to answer the first of these questions in the affirmative. I am of opinion with BOWEN, L.J., and for the same reasons, that the bonds, before they were taken to the bank on Oct. 20th, 1887, had been appropriated to the respondent, in substitution for his original bonds of the same amount, which Delmar had previously disposed of without authority. The second question must also, in my opinion, be answered in the affirmative. Each bond, according to its tenor, appears to me to represent that the document will pass from hand to hand, and that any bona fide holder will be entitled to claim fulfilment of its terms from the Buenos Aires Bank, by whom it was issued. Then there is direct testimony to the effect that, on the London Stock Exchange, the bonds do pass from hand to hand by delivery only, and are treated as negotiable securities, and no attempt was made to shake that testimony either by cross-examination, or by adducing evidence to the contrary. In my opinion it necessarily follows from the negotiable character of the documents, that Delmar, who was lawfully in possession of them for a special purpose, was, nevertheless, in a position to give a valid title to any person acquiring the bonds from him in good faith, and for value, although the transaction on his part, involved a fraud upon the respondent. That is the rule of law which was laid down by PARKE, B. (following the older authorities), in Foster v. Pearson (4), and it met with the approval of this House in Goodwin v. Roberts (2). C D E F

That the appellants gave value for the bonds is not disputed, and I have not found anything in the evidence or in the circumstances of this case to suggest that they acted otherwise than in good faith. They were dealing with a broker, at that time of unblemished repute, and, seeing that brokers, in the ordinary course of business, are employed to sell, to buy, and to raise money upon as well as to keep in custody the securities of their customers, I think the appellants were entitled to assume, in the absence of aught to indicate the contrary, that whether the bonds belonged to Delmar, or to a customer, he had full authority to deal with them. The real question is whether the appellants believed, at the time, that Delmar had such authority, and I see no reason to doubt that they honestly entertained that belief. G H

The Court of Appeal, whose judgment was delivered by BOWEN, L.J., seem to have held that, in point of fact, the appellants believed that Delmar had authority to raise money on the Cedula bonds in question, within the limit of their market value, but not to deposit them en bloc, together with other securities in order to raise a lump sum upon the whole. Even upon that assumption I should have given judgment for the appellants. They were, in my opinion, clearly entitled to retain the bonds for the amount which Delmar had apparent authority to borrow. I may observe that in the case where the true owner authorises a specific chattel to be impledged for its market value, he might suffer prejudice, and it would be an excess of the authority which he gave, to deposit it as part security for a larger sum. I doubt whether the same principle applies where the authority relates, I

A not to a specific chattel, but to negotiable securities which are the subject of traffic upon the Stock Exchange. In that case it appears to me to be immaterial to the true owner whether his securities are pledged by themselves for their full market value, or are deposited with other securities in order to cover an advance beyond that value.

B The learned judges in the courts below do not appear to have accepted the judgment of this House in Earl of Sheffield v. London Joint Stock Bank (1) in the same sense in which it has been regarded here with reference to that case. I can only say that it certainly was not my intention to apply any other rule to its decision than that which was laid down in Foster v. Pearson (4). But I was satisfied, upon the evidence before us, that the banks concerned had such notice and knowledge of the limited title of their pledgor as made it inconsistent with fair C mercantile dealing that they should retain Lord Sheffield's securities for any sum beyond the extent of the pledgor's interest.

LORD HERSCHELL stated the facts and continued: I do not propose to enter upon the inquiry whether the plaintiff can establish a title to the bonds deposited with the bank, for, in the view which I take of the case, it is unnecessary to do D so. I shall assume, for the purpose of my opinion, that these bonds were the property of the plaintiff. The first question which arises, and, to my mind, a cardinal one, is: Are these bonds negotiable instruments? The general rule of the law is that where a person has obtained the property of another from one who is dealing with it without the authority of the true owner, no title is acquired as against that owner, even though full value be given, and the property be taken in E the belief that an unquestionable title thereto is being obtained, unless the person taking it can show that the true owner has so acted as to mislead him into the belief that the person dealing with the property had authority to do so. If this can be shown, a good title is acquired by personal estoppel against the true owner. There is an exception to the general rule, however, in the case of negotiable instruments. Any person in possession of these may convey a good title to them even F when he is acting in fraud of the true owner, and although such owner has done nothing tending to mislead the person taking them. I shall advert hereafter to the conditions which are requisite in order to render the title of one who takes a negotiable instrument valid as against the true owner; but I dwell for the moment on the distinction to which I have called attention, because it is obvious that the facts to be proved by any one seeking to retain property he has obtained as against G the person in fraud of whom it has been delivered to him, will differ essentially according as that property is or is not a negotiable instrument.

At the trial of the action, evidence was given on behalf of the bank that Cedula bonds are commonly dealt with on the Stock Exchange. On the question being put: "Are they dealt with as negotiable securities?" the learned judge intervened with the observation: "There is no dispute about that," on which the learned H counsel for the plaintiff said: "I do not want to make that admission." The question was then put and answered in the affirmative. There was no cross-examination by the plaintiff's counsel directed to this point, nor was any testimony adduced to the contrary. Having regard to the evidence thus given as to the nature of the bonds, and to the decision of this House in Goodwin v. Roberts (2) I can entertain no doubt that these Cedula bonds are negotiable instruments within I the purview of that decision.

The question then which presents itself is whether the appellants who are in possession of negotiable instruments which were delivered to them, I will assume, in fraud of the plaintiff, the true owner, can make good their title to them? That they became owners for value is not disputed. Nor is it disputed that they took with full honesty of purpose. The allegation in the statement of claim is as follows:

"The bank knew and had notice not only from the general course of business hereinbefore referred to, but from the particular transactions between them and the plaintiff's brokers, that the securities deposited with them by the plaintiff's brokers were the securities of the customers of such brokers, and in the belief that the brokers who brought them made sufficient advances on them to justify them in obtaining the amounts which they from time to time obtained from the bank, and relying on the integrity of the brokers the defendant's bank from time to time made, and continued to make advances to the brokers on such securities as the brokers from time to time deposited with them."

Applying this allegation to the transaction under consideration, it would be impossible to conceive a more unequivocal admission that the appellants acted in complete good faith in taking the bonds in question. But the statement of claim goes on to allege that the bank

"made no specific inquiries as to the ownership of the said securities, or the authority (if any) which the brokers had to deposit the same, or the interest (if any) which the brokers had therein by reason of advances on such securities, or otherwise."

It is upon this allegation that the bank had notice that Delmar held these bonds in the capacity of an agent that the respondent relies. I defer entering upon the inquiry whether it has been proved that the bank had either notice or knowledge that Delmar's title to the bonds was that of an agent only. Assuming that for the moment that this was proved, what is its effect? It is contended on behalf of the respondent, as I understand, that it put the bank upon inquiry as to the title of the person with whom they dealt and as to the authority which he possessed, and that having made no such inquiry they obtained as against his principal no better title than he had. It was admitted that anyone buying from Delmar would have obtained an unimpeachable title, notwithstanding his knowledge that Delmar was a broker, and that the bonds were the property of his principal. What ground is there for the proposition that in regard to a pledge the case is different, that one may safely take a negotiable instrument by way of sale from an agent without inquiry, but cannot so take it by way of pledge? It is surely of the very essence of a negotiable instrument that you may treat the person in possession of it as having authority to deal with it, be he agent or otherwise, unless you know to the contrary and are not compelled in order to secure a good title for yourself to inquire into the nature of his title, or the extent of his authority. The Factors Act, 1825 [repealed by the Factors Act, 1889], which gives validity to sales and pledge by persons entrusted with the documents of title to goods, contained a proviso

"that the purchaser or pledgee had not notice by the documents, or otherwise, that the seller or pledgor was not the actual and bona fide owner of the goods sold or pledged; a proviso which, especially after the decision in Fletcher v. Heath (5) rendered it unsafe to make advances on goods or documents to persons known to have possession thereof as agents only:"

per BLACKBURN, J., in Cole v. North-Western Bank (6) (L.R. 10 C.P. at p. 367). Accordingly the legislature intervened and altered the law by the Factors Act, 1842 [repealed by the Act of 1889]. The recital is noteworthy, that

"advances on the security of goods and merchandise have become a usual and ordinary course of business, and it is expedient and necessary that reasonable and safe facilities should be afforded thereto."

Under this Act a document of title to goods may safely be taken by way of pledge from one known to be an agent without any inquiry as to his authority.

It would be strange, indeed, if a negotiable instrument might not as safely be taken. Advances on the security of negotiable instruments are as usual and ordinary a course of business as advances on the security of goods and merchandise, and it is surely just as

"expedient and necessary that reasonable and safe facilities should be afforded thereto."

- A It was truly said that it was due to the act of the legislature that documents of title to goods may safely be taken by way of pledge from an agent, and that there had been no such legislation in relation to negotiable instruments. But why not? The answer, to my mind, is plain; because it never was supposed to be necessary in order to give validity to such a transaction in the case of negotiable instruments. It is admitted that in the case of a sale, legislation was not requisite, that the fact
- B that the instruments were negotiable sufficed; why not then in the case of a pledge? If the contention of the respondent is to prevail, a negotiable instrument will be less negotiable than a bill of lading, or a dock warrant; a strange conclusion surely. The truth is, in my opinion, that what the Factors Acts have done is to attach some of the elements of negotiability to documents of title to goods, to render the mere possession of them evidence of authority to deal with them in the ordinary
- C course of business, and to preclude the necessity of any further inquiry.

I proceed now to consider what the authorities show to be the conditions necessary to give a good title to a person taking a negotiable instrument from one who had as against the true owners no authority to transfer it. In Foster v. Pearson (4) PARKE, B., said (1 Cr.M. & R. at pp. 855, 860):

- D “The rule of law was long considered as being firmly established that the holder of bills of exchange endorsed in blank or other negotiable securities transferable by delivery could give a title which he himself did not possess to a bona fide holder for value; and it may well be questioned whether it has been wisely departed from in the case to which reference has been made, and other subsequent cases in which care and caution in the taker of such securities has been
- E treated as essential to the validity of his title besides, and independently of honesty of purpose.”

It will be observed that the learned judge considered two conditions only to be well established as essential to confer a good title upon the holder of a negotiable instrument, viz., that he should have taken it bona fide and for value. The other condition which he mentions, that due care and caution should have been exercised

F by the taker of the securities he refers to as a departure from “a rule of law long considered as being firmly established,” and he deprecates its introduction. The law has now for some time been settled on this point in accordance with the view indicated by PARKE, B.

In Bank of Bengal v. Fagan (7) LORD BROUGHAM said (7 Moo.P.C.C. at p. 72):

- G “It may be taken as established that whatever may have been the law laid down in Gill v. Cubitt (8) and Down v. Halling (9) and one or two other cases, and not abandoned, at least as far as language went which the court used in subsequent cases, is now law no longer, and that the negligence of the party taking a negotiable instrument does not fix him with the defective title of the party passing it to him.”

- H This passage was quoted by WILLES, J., in delivering his judgment in Raphael v. Bank of England (10), where it was treated as undoubted law that negligence did not invalidate the title of a person taking a negotiable instrument in good faith and for value. I think, therefore, that the rule of law enunciated by PARKE, B., is firmly established as the existing law.

- I No authority to the contrary was cited at the Bar, unless it be the recent case in this House of Earl of Sheffield v. London Joint Stock Bank (1). It is certain that none of the noble and learned Lords who took part in that decision criticised or questioned, much less purported to overrule, any prior authority. I will state what I understand to be the grounds of the decision. The person from whom the bank took the securities in that case was himself a pledgee of them; as such he had an undoubted right to re-pledge them. He in fact re-pledged them as security for a sum exceeding that for which he held them in pledge. They were with a number of other instruments, some negotiable and others not negotiable, made security for his entire indebtedness to the bank. The question which arose was whether the bank could insist on retaining them for the larger sum, or whether the owner could redeem them on paying to the bank the amount for which they were originally pledged. The noble and learned Lords came to the conclusion, as I understand, that the bank knew that Mozley held the securities in question as pledgee only in respect of an advance made upon them, or that, if they did not actually know this, what they knew of the nature of his business as a money-lender, and the information which they derived from their transactions with him made it almost certain that this was the case; that, knowing or having every reason to believe that his title was only that of pledgee for a limited advance, they knew, or had reason to believe that, in pledging them to the bank for his entire indebtedness, he was exceeding any authority he had to deal with them; that, under these circumstances, it was incumbent upon them to make some further investigation if they wished to insist upon their security to the full extent; that these circumstances, as it was said, put them upon inquiry. A B C

I gather that their Lordships must further have been of opinion that, if the bank had made reasonable inquiries, they would have ascertained the facts, and have thus had distinct knowledge of circumstances which would have made it appear that they could not hold the securities for anything beyond the advance in respect of which Mozley held them, and that in offering them as a security for a greater sum Mozley was exceeding any authority he had to deal with them. My reason for inferring that their Lordships entertained this opinion is that I apprehend that when it is said that a person is put on inquiry the result in point of law is that he is deemed to know the facts which he would have ascertained if he had made inquiry. He cannot better his position by abstaining from so doing. On the other hand, his position cannot be worse than it would have been had he made inquiry, and been in possession of the result of it. Supposing Mozley had been questioned as to his right to deal with the securities, and had given a satisfactory assurance, and there had been no reason to doubt his honesty, I cannot but think that the decision of this House would have been different. There was in the case then before the House, however, no ground for supposing that, if Mozley had been asked the question, the facts would not have been elicited. D E F

When once the conclusion was reached that the bank must be taken to have known that Mozley was exceeding any rights which he possessed in relation to the securities in purporting to pledge them for the sum he did, it followed that it would be contrary to good faith for the bank to retain them for anything beyond the sum for which he could legitimately pledge them, and that, as regards the excess, the bank, though holders for value, were not holders of the securities in good faith. It will thus be seen that the decision, which certainly did not purport to be a new departure or to lay down any principle of law differing from that already established, turned entirely upon the view taken of the facts. It would be unbecoming as it is unnecessary for me to express any opinion whether the findings were warranted by the facts proved. It is enough for me to say that the decision leaves untouched what I believe to have been down to that time the established rule of law, that a person taking a negotiable instrument in good faith and for value obtains a title valid against all the world. Earl of Sheffield v. London Joint Stock Bank (1) may, perhaps, be a binding authority as to the conclusion of the facts arrived at, where the facts are identical, but not otherwise. In any other case the tribunal must investigate the facts for itself and determine whether those who claim to hold a negotiable instrument have made out that they took it in good faith and for value. G H I

One word I would say upon the question of notice, and being put upon inquiry. I should be sorry to see the doctrine of constructive notice introduced into the law of negotiable instruments. But regard to the facts of which the taker of such instruments had notice is most material in considering whether he took in good faith. If there be anything which excites the suspicion that there is something wrong in the transaction, the taker of the instrument is not acting in good faith if

A he shuts his eyes to the facts presented to him and puts the suspicions aside without further inquiry.

Applying myself now to the facts of the present case, I cannot find any warrant for such conclusions of fact as those which, as I think, led to the recent decision of your Lordships' House on which so much reliance has been placed. The bank did not know, and had no reason to know, in what capacity Delmar became possessed of the bonds. They might be his own; he might be purchasing them for himself or for a principal, and be seeking by an advance from the bank to obtain the means of paying the price, or they might be bonds on which he had himself made an advance. I cannot see that there was anything to suggest to the bank that he was committing a wrong, or to make it reasonable and right that they should make further inquiry before entering upon the transaction. It was suggested, and this view seems to have found some favour with the court below, that, though the bank might have been justified in thinking that Delmar had the power to pledge the bonds for an advance to their full market value, they were not justified in supposing that he could be entitled to pledge them en bloc with other securities for a lump sum. If the course of dealing between the bank and Delmar was, as alleged, such that he was entitled at any time to obtain back any of the securities deposited on delivering others of an equal value, the distinction does not strike me as very important. But, even if it could be material were the plaintiff seeking to redeem his bonds, and the question were for what sum the bank could claim to retain them, it does not seem to me to be material in the present case, where the plaintiff is not seeking to redeem his bonds, but insists that the bank have no title to them at all. Further, assuming for the moment that the bank were put on inquiry and ought to have asked Delmar whether the bonds were his, and if not, by what title he claimed to deal with them in the manner proposed, can it be doubted what would have been the result of such an inquiry? Why, your Lordships have listened to an elaborate argument, for which there was ample scope, designed to establish that the bonds were in fact Delmar's, and that if he had answered, as I think he undoubtedly would, that the bonds were his own, his answer would have been accurate. How can it possibly be contended that, if the bank had made further inquiry, they would have ascertained that Delmar was not entitled to make the pledge on which the bank take their stand?

I have made these observations for the purpose of showing the marked distinction which there is between the facts of the present case and those which had to be considered in Sheffield's Case (1). But I desire to rest my decision upon the broad and simple ground that I find, as a matter of fact, that the bank took the bonds in good faith and for value. It is easy enough to make an elaborate presentation after the event of the speculations with which the bank managers might have occupied themselves in reference to the capacity in which the broker who offered the bonds as security for an advance, held them. I think, however, they were not bound to occupy their minds with any such speculations. I apprehend that when a person whose honesty there is no reason to doubt offers negotiable securities to a banker or any other person the only consideration likely to engage his attention is whether the security is sufficient to justify the advance required. I do not think that the law lays upon him the obligation of making any inquiry into the title of the person whom he finds in possession of them; of course, if there is anything to arouse suspicion, to lead to a doubt whether the person purporting to transfer them is justified in entering into the contemplated transaction, the case would be different, the existence of such suspicion or doubt would be inconsistent with good faith. And if no inquiry were made, or if on inquiry the doubt were not removed, and the suspicion dissipated, I should have no hesitation in holding that good faith was wanting in a person thus acting. For the reasons I have given I think the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—There are only three possible questions in this case: (i) Did the "Cedulas," which were deposited with the London Joint Stock Bank on Oct. 28, 1887, belong to the respondent at the time when they left the office of Herapath, Delmar & Co.? (ii) Were these "Cedulas" negotiable instruments? (iii) Did the bank take them in good faith? That the bank gave value for them was never disputed. In the view which your Lordships take of the last two questions, the answer to the first, whatever it may be, cannot affect the result of the case. But, as both courts have considered the question and answered it on consideration in the affirmative, I am unwilling to pass it by in silence lest I should seem to intimate a doubt for which, in my opinion, there is no room. A B

The firm of Herapath Delmar & Co. consisting of a Mr. Herapath, who was admittedly innocent of any fraud, and a Mr. Delmar, who was undoubtedly a fraudulent person, held 15,000 dollars "Cedulas, series J." on account of the respondent. They were held by the firm for safe custody only. On Oct. 12, 1887, Delmar, without the knowledge of his partner, and in fraud of his customer, sold them. On the same day Delmar on account of his firm contracted to buy "Cedulas" of the same amount and of the same denomination to be delivered on Oct. 28. In due course "Cedulas" to answer this contract were delivered and paid for. To whom did these "Cedulas" belong when they came into the office of Herapath, Delmar & Co.? The object of the purchase, of course, was to repair and conceal the wrong which had been committed. Both the clerks concerned in the transaction, who had no reason to suspect anything improper, say they knew at the time whose they were, and that they were the respondent's; neither of them was asked any question as to how he got this knowledge, nor is it material. There is no reason to distrust their recollection. And the only conclusion is that in some way or other, by word of mouth or by writing or by conduct, Delmar, who had dominion over these "Cedulas," must have declared that they belonged to the respondent. Thus, even without the aid of the entry in the number book, the value of which depends on a disputed fact, the date when the original entry was corrected or altered, there was as it seems to me a sufficient appropriation of the "Cedulas" in question to show that they were the property of the respondent subject to his right to repudiate the transaction when he came to know the true facts. C D E

Then, were these "Cedulas" negotiable instruments? The "Cedulas" in question are foreign bonds with coupons attached payable to bearer. Admittedly they pass from hand to hand on the Stock Exchange, and according to the evidence of the bank manager, who was not cross-examined on the point, they are dealt with as negotiable instruments. I do not see on what ground they are to be denied the quality of complete negotiability. In a matter of this sort it is not, I think, desirable to set up refined distinctions which are not understood, or are uniformly and persistently ignored in the daily practice of the Stock Exchange. F G

Lastly, did the bank take the "Cedulas" in good faith? They took them with other securities from a firm of stockbrokers who were at the time of unblemished reputation. They took them in the ordinary way of business to cover their current advances. In regard to this question the difficulty is to see what there was in the transaction to suggest a shadow of suspicion that there was anything wrong with the deposit. The only objection alleged is that securities of different customers of the stockbrokers were pledged for one entire advance, and it is said that the bank ought to have known it. But even so, if the bank had no reason to suppose that the stockbrokers were not at liberty to pledge each and all of the securities for their full value, I cannot see in what the supposed want of good faith consists. As was pointed out in Foster v. Pearson (4) such a practice—and the practice prevails in the case of stockbrokers just as much as in the case of billbrokers—has advantages for the customers as a body, though it may occasionally operate hardly on an individual. H I

If it had not been for a mistaken interpretation of your Lordships' decision in the Earl of Sheffield's Case (1), I doubt whether the present case would ever have been brought into court. That case depended upon its own peculiar circumstances. The settled law relating to negotiable securities was not in question. No one impugned it. No one, as I understand the argument, thought of reviving qualifications

A long since exploded. But then it was held that the bank knew, or ought to have known, that the securities which the moneylender Mozley was depositing with them had been pledged to him by his several customers, and, therefore, that they were not his own, and that he could not pledge them for their full value. There was no want of good faith on the part of the bank in taking them in security to the extent of Mozley's pledgeable interest. But there was, as it seems to me, a want of good faith in claiming a right to retain them for more than that limited interest, whatever it might turn out to be. In commenting on the Earl of Sheffield's Case (1), counsel for the bank, referring to some remarks of mine in which the expression "representation" occurred, observed that the words used went too far. Of course there were no representations on the part of Mozley but what were contained in the memorandum of charge. And certainly I did not mean to convey that, if the bank had received from Mozley explanations which a reasonable man could possibly accept, the bank might not have held the securities for their whole value. But I think the criticism of the learned counsel was perfectly well founded, and I should have better expressed myself if I had said that whereas it had been supposed that the memorandum of charge neutralised the knowledge otherwise properly attributable to the bank, it seemed to me that that knowledge must prevail over the inference to be derived from the memorandum. I agree that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed.

LORD FIELD.—I also am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. First I am satisfied that the Cédulas in question are instruments in which property and possession are inseparable, and that delivery and possession, if taken in good faith, confer a valid title. They impliedly contain a promise to pay to bearer; they are issued and circulated in a foreign State; and, although the evidence as to the extent of their negotiability in this country was not (probably owing to a misapprehension) so full as it might have been, enough, I think, appears to bring the case within the authorities of Gorgier v. Mieville (3), and Goodwin v. Roberts (2). Secondly, it is not disputed that the bank are holders for value. It is not suggested that they were themselves guilty of any dishonesty or bad faith; on the contrary, BOWEN, L.J., expressly finds that they were "honestly of opinion that Delmar could lawfully make the pledge in question." Their title, therefore, as holders in good faith cannot be defeated if it is shown that they also held without notice, i.e., not necessarily actual notice or knowledge of any infirmity, but without the knowledge of circumstances calculated to excite suspicion in the mind of the bank manager, who with the means of further knowledge at hand, wilfully abstained from availing himself of those means and making inquiry from a suspicion that the result would be to inform him of some vice or infirmity of title by which the pledge the bank were about to take might be rendered insecure.

It was at one time, no doubt, thought that the title of a holder for value of a negotiable instrument would be destroyed if the omission to inquire arose not from any suspicion of a defect, but merely from a want of due care and caution on his part, but the authorities cited by LORD HERSCHELL have conclusively established that such is not the law. In one of those cases, Raphael v. Bank of England (10), the plaintiff had at some earlier period received actual notice that the bank note in question had been stolen, but it was established to the satisfaction of the jury that the notice had been forgotten, and was not present to his mind at the time of taking, and he was held entitled to recover. In another case, Foster v. Pearson (4), cited by my noble friend, some of the objections to the plaintiff's title were somewhat analogous to those in the present case. One of them was that the bills then in question were pledged to the plaintiff by the bill broker for an antecedent debt of his own, but PARKE, B., after stating that the rule that the holder of negotiable securities transferable by delivery can give a title which he himself does not possess to a bona fide holder for value had been long considered firmly established, added that it was unnecessary to decide the validity of a usage for a bill broker to pledge for his own antecedent debt (which had been set up, but failed in proof), because, assuming the broker to have no such power as between him and his employer, or as to third persons who receive the bills with knowledge of all the facts, it by no means followed that Messrs. Fosters would not have a right to hold the bill. They might have supposed that the brokers were acting rightly in pledging their customers' bills, even if they knew them to be such, for their prior advance, because they might have given to those very customers a part of the £2,500, which was the amount of that prior advance. It is, I think, worthy of observation that in the present case a portion of the £6,500 which was advanced to Delmar on Oct. 27, undoubtedly went to provide cash to meet a cheque drawn in payment for the substituted "Cedulas." I do not suggest, of course, that the bank manager was aware of this, or that it could have formed any part of his calculations in taking the security; but it tends to show, as regards any inquiry of Delmar, if the defect in the appellants' title rests upon the absence of inquiry of Delmar, which was the only means of further knowledge that presented itself to the manager, how little probability there is that the answer would have disclosed the absence of authority on his part to make the pledge.

Another objection taken to the appellant's title in this case, as putting the manager upon inquiry, also existed in Foster v. Pearson (4). But it was overruled, for it was said that, although a bill broker must ordinarily be taken to be an agent to procure the loan of money on each customer's bill separately, without any right to mix bills together, and pledge the mass for one entire sum advanced to him personally, yet his employment is one which depends entirely upon the course of dealing, and there would be nothing unusual or unreasonable in such a course of dealing in the city of London for bill brokers to raise money for their employers by pledging the bills of different proprietors for one advance. In answer to the objection, PARKE, B., said that, although on the one hand one proprietor may have to answer for the non-payment of another's bill, on the other hand it may give facilities to the raising of money on negotiable paper, for it may well happen that a capitalist would advance money in this way who would not discount each particular bill. Indeed, in the case now before your Lordships, it was suggested, and may well be the case, that by that means the broker's customer obtains a loan on more favourable terms than if the broker could only pledge for each customer's individual debt.

Looking to the various exigencies of a stockbroker's legitimate business, as now carried on in the city of London, I fail to see any circumstances which ought in the present case to have caused the bank manager to suspect that Delmar was pledging securities which had been entrusted to him for safe keeping. The previous long connection with, and high character of the firm of which he was a member, their extensive previous dealings, in which no irregularity is suggested as having taken place, tended to obviate the necessity for any inquiry, and I do not see any satisfactory ground for coming to the conclusion that the manager wilfully abstained from making it. Indeed, the grounds upon which, as I understand, the judgments of the courts below rest their decision exclude any such wilful closing of the eyes of the manager. What I understand is said against him is that, as he took the "Cedulas" with knowledge that they might not belong in full dominion to the brokers, the manager wilfully abstained from inquiry into Delmar's title from a misconception of law in thinking that he had authority in law so to do without express authority given by the customer.

The learned judges below did not in any way question the principles upon which the authorities I have referred to rest, but they appear to have thought that the present case was covered by the recent decision of this House in the Earl of Sheffield's Case (1). That case has undergone a very searching examination at your Lordships' Bar, and I have had the advantage of hearing the true view of it, as intended and understood by the Lord Chancellor and those of my noble and learned friends who advised your Lordships on that occasion, and I am quite satisfied, not only that no intention existed of questioning those principles, but that no such qualification is anywhere indicated. The decision seems to me to

A have proceeded rather upon the lines of Cooke & Sons v. Eshelby (11), and cases of that class in which actual knowledge of the existence of an agency of a limited character only is held to put the person dealing with the agent upon inquiry as to the extent of it. It was, indeed, contended at your Lordships' Bar that mere knowledge that a proposed transferee might be dealing with a security as an agent was sufficient to put the transferee of a negotiable security upon inquiry, the mere absence of which, if a defect was in fact found to exist, would be fatal to his title. But I cannot accede to this contention. It is contrary to the authorities I have referred to, and it runs counter to the policy of the legislature, which seems to me to be to protect rather than endanger the rights of persons taking securities of a negotiable character honestly and in good faith. It is for these reasons that I think that the appeal must be allowed.

Slander Absolute privilege Qualified privilege—Tribunal acting administratively—County council considering applications for music and dancing licences—Malice—Reckless publication of slander regardless of truth—Burden of proof.

G

Absolute privilege attaches to all judicial proceedings and also to the proceedings of tribunals which have the attributes of a court of justice, e.g., a military court of inquiry: Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1) (1875), L.R. 7 H.L. 744; but it does not extend to the proceedings of a tribunal acting administratively, e.g., a county council when considering applications for music and dancing licences, although such a tribunal has to decide judicially in the sense of acting fairly and impartially. The statement of a member of a county council on such an occasion, however, will, if made bona fide and without malice, be entitled to qualified privilege.

H

Malice can be established by proof of a state of mind short of deliberate falsehood, but which leads the person publishing the words complained of, from anger or some other wrong motive, to be reckless whether the aspersions he casts on other people are true or false, regardless of the truth. The burden of proving malice is on the plaintiff in an action for defamation.

Application by the defendant for judgment or a new trial on the ground of misdirection and that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence at the trial before HAWKINS, J., with a special jury.

The plaintiffs were proprietors of a place of public entertainment at Westminster, and they claimed damages for a slander upon them in the way of their business uttered by the defendant, a member of the London County Council, at a meeting of the council in October, 1890, held to consider applications for music and dancing licences under the Disorderly Houses Act, 1751, s. 2, the jurisdiction of the justices at quarter sessions under that Act having been transferred to the London

A County Council by the Local Government Act, 1888. At this meeting the plaintiffs applied for a licence, and in a speech made by the defendant in opposition to the application he uttered the following words, which were the subject of this action:

B "I spent about half an hour at the Aquarium a few months ago, and during the time I was there there was a performance going on upon the stage of the Aquarium of some Japanese figures. They were not living figures, but exceedingly large automata, and the talk was provided of course by someone who was invisible. These two figures, a male and female Japanese, were chasing a butterfly round the stage, and they came to a point where the female figure sat down and said: 'I have got it.' The male figure, standing in front, said: 'Where?' And then, I state, there was the most indecent action of the female figure that you could possibly imagine. Now, I say that that is just as bad as though the figures were living. It was done on the stage in the afternoon, when we are told that it is so respectable that we are to take our families there. I say that that was an indecent action. I will tell any gentlemen privately exactly what it was; but so it was, and I consider that that was an indecent performance."

D He added that those were the reasons why he intended to vote against granting a licence to the plaintiffs. The defendant pleaded that he spoke the words without malice, and that, even if he had been actuated by express malice, the occasion on which he spoke afforded him absolute immunity, and that he was entitled to notice of action under the Justices Protection Act, 1848, s. 9 [repealed], the words spoken by him being a thing done in the execution of his office. At the trial, HAWKINS, J., directed the jury that, if they thought that the defendant uttered the words complained of without malice and with an honest belief in their truth, then, however untrue the words might have been, he was privileged by the occasion on which they were uttered, but, if the defendant did not honestly believe his statement to be true, and made it for the purpose of defeating the plaintiffs in their application for a licence, the plaintiffs would be entitled to damages. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for £250, and the learned judge upon further consideration gave judgment for them for that amount.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Murphy, Q.C., and R. M. Bray for the defendant.

Lockwood, Q.C., and H.F. Dickens for the plaintiffs.

G Feb. 20, 1892. The following judgments were read.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case an action has been brought by the plaintiffs for slander in the way of their business, and the jury have found that the defendant made a statement which he knew at the time to be false, and have H awarded the plaintiffs £250 damages. That being so, application is now made to us that judgment should be entered for the defendant on several grounds. The statement was made by the defendant at a meeting of the London County Council of which he is a member, and the occasion of his making it was when there was a question before the council whether a music and dancing licence should be granted to the plaintiffs. He expressed his opinion very strongly that it should I not be granted, and used the strongest language, saying that he had been to the Aquarium and had seen there the most indecent performance he or anyone else had ever seen. The performance was described by him as taking place between two figures, dressed one as a man and the other as a woman, who were supposed to be chasing a butterfly. Even if the figures had been so dressed, it would have been nonsense to say that the performance was the most indecent that had ever been seen; but it turns out that the figures were dressed as two men, so that the indecency was really only the defendant's imagination. The jury found in effect that he knew what was the truth, and he told a deliberate falsehood, and the question which this court has now to determine is whether there was evidence to go to the jury to support that verdict. A

It was argued on behalf of the defendant, in the first place, that when he uttered the words which are complained of he was exercising a judicial function, and is, therefore, entitled to perfect immunity, whatever he may have said. It is true that, in respect of what is said before a court of justice, whether or not it may be false or scandalous or malicious perfect immunity from any liability to an action is enjoyed by the person who utters it, whether he be judge, counsel, or witness. The immunity of a witness is, of course, only from an action for slander, not from an indictment for perjury. The ground of that rule is public policy, and nothing else. It is true with regard to courts of justice of all kinds, both great and small, and the rule has even been carried further. It is applicable in the case of authorised tribunals which, though not courts of justice, have the attributes of a court of justice. In Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1) the doctrine was extended so as to apply to a military court of inquiry, which was an authorised inquiry and conducted as nearly as possible in the same way as it would have been in a court of justice. It was in that sense that that tribunal was said to have been acting judicially, namely, acting as nearly as possible in the same way as a court of justice. But the doctrine has never been carried further than as applying to courts of law, and to tribunals acting as nearly as possible in the same way. B C D

Can it be said that a county council acts in the same way as a court of law when it is considering applications for music and dancing licences? It is difficult to say that the members are judges acting judicially in such a case; judges would hardly make speeches such as the defendant, and no doubt many other members, did on this occasion. The truth is that the proceedings before such a body have no resemblance to an inquiry before a court of justice, and the rule as to immunity for what is spoken before a court could not be applied in this case. There is another point urged before us on behalf of the plaintiffs—that this duty with regard to licences which has been transferred from the justices is not a judicial, but is an administrative, duty. Justices at quarter sessions had two separate and distinct duties. When trying prisoners they are no doubt a court of justice, and, as such, entitled to the absolute immunity I have mentioned; but they also had administrative duties, for the purpose of performing which they held consultation with each other, as, for instance, when granting licences. When such administrative duties were transferred to the county council, the consultation held by the council for the purpose of performing such duties still remains what it was; it is not a judicial act. This administrative consultation which was being held when the defendant uttered the words complained of was, therefore, not in a court of justice, and consequently the defendant is not entitled to the perfect immunity which he claims. E F G

Then comes the question whether this was a privileged occasion. When persons are engaged in performing a duty of great public importance, and when for the purpose of doing that duty they consult together with the object of coming to a decision in the matter, no doubt the occasion is a privileged one. Then what may be said there, although it may be slanderous, is privileged, so long as the person who utters it is acting bona fide; that is to say, so long as he is using the occasion for its proper purpose, and is not abusing it. It is sometimes said that the question is whether such a person is acting bona fide, and not maliciously; but that is not, I think, quite a good way of putting the point—it is better to say: Is he using the occasion honestly, or is he abusing it? If he makes a statement which he knows to be untrue, he must be abusing the occasion. The jury in this case have found that the defendant knew at the time that he was telling a falsehood. I myself should be loth to find that. But there is a state of mind, short of deliberate wilful falsehood, which would justify a jury in holding that the defendant had abused the occasion, and in that sense had acted maliciously. If from anger, or from some other wrong motive, a person H I

A allows his mind to get into such a state that he is reckless whether the aspersions he casts on other people are true or false, then I think that a jury is justified in finding that he has not used, but has abused, the occasion.

Therefore, the question here turns upon whether there was evidence of such a state of mind in the defendant. It has been said that anger is such a state of mind; but I have no doubt that gross and unreasoning prejudice with regard to the subject-matter that was being dealt with would have the same effect. If a person charged with the duty of dealing with other people's affairs allows his mind to get into such a state as that, so that he is reckless whether the statements he makes while pushing forward his own views are true or false, there would be evidence on which a jury would be justified in finding that he had abused the occasion. Is there evidence here that the defendant allowed his mind to get into that state? It does not seem that anyone else believed the figures to represent a man and a woman, and I do not think that the defendant could really have made the mistake if he had taken any care about the matter. The expressions he has used show that he allowed his mind to get into that reckless state that I have referred to, in consequence of the prejudice he was under. His statement before the county council that the performance was the most indecent that could be imagined shows that his observation was most casual, that he could not have taken any pains to satisfy his mind, and that he was not acting simply and fairly from a consideration of what his duty was. He made his statement utterly regardless of the truth, or of any personal injury he might be inflicting, perfectly reckless whether what he was saying was true or false. I think that the jury were justified in finding that that was the nature of his conduct, and that he had abused the occasion, and, therefore, they were entitled to give the verdict that they have given.

[HIS LORDSHIP dealt with a point on s. 9 of the Justices Protection Act, 1848 (repealed), and concluded:] The verdict, therefore stands, and this application must be dismissed. I must add that by our judgment we are not differing in any way from what was said in R. v. London County Council; Ex parte Akkersdyk (2). That case merely decides that wherever a man has authority to decide upon a matter affecting another he must decide fairly and impartially, according to the rules of reason and justice. A person cannot be at the same time accuser and judge.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Several arguments have been addressed to us, but the principal one, which I will deal with first, was that the defendant is entitled to absolute immunity from an action for anything said by him as a member of the county council while dealing with applications for licences for music and dancing.

For the purposes of that argument, therefore, I will assume that the defendant made the defamatory statement complained of both falsely and maliciously. The first inquiry is: What is the law with regard to immunity in cases of this description; and I will then consider the nature of the duty cast upon the defendant. The largest statement of the immunity, so far as I can find, is in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1), in which it is laid down (L.R. 8 Q.B. at p. 263) that

I "the authorities are clear, uniform and conclusive that no action of libel or slander lies, whether against judges, counsel, witnesses, or parties, for words written or spoken in the ordinary course of any proceeding before any court or tribunal recognised by law."

I accept that statement, but I doubt whether the words "or tribunal" do not rather embarrass it, because, though it may be used there as an equivalent to "court," the word "tribunal" has not any ascertainable meaning in English, as the word "court" has. But I think that the judgment of the court proceeds on the footing that "tribunal" means the same as "court," because it goes on to inquire into the nature of the particular court then in question, and the conclusion come to (ibid. at p. 266) is that a military court of inquiry, A

"though not a court of record, nor a court of law, nor coming within the ordinary definition of a court of justice, is nevertheless a court duly and legally constituted and recognised in the articles of war and many Acts of Parliament."

I do not wish to attempt any definition of a "court," but in English law a court may perform various functions. Parliament is a court, though its chief duties are deliberative and legislative; the duties of only a part of it are judicial. There are many other courts which are not courts of justice, such as courts of investigation like the coroner's court. B

I think, therefore, that the immunity does not depend upon whether or not the court is a court of justice, but whether it is legally a court or not. When the court exists, the law attaches to it certain privileges, one of which is the immunity in question. But it is said that this law as to immunity is based on principles of public policy, and that wherever a body has to decide questions and in so doing has to act judicially there is a judicial proceeding to which this immunity ought to attach. It appears to me that in that argument "judicially" is used as meaning that the inquiry should be carried on with that fairness and impartiality which characterise proceedings in a court of justice and are proper to the functions of a judge, not as meaning that the members of the body engaged in the inquiry are members of a court. Consider how far that would go if every one acting fairly and impartially in an inquiry were held to be acting judicially so as to be entitled to this immunity. It would apply to assessment committees, boards of guardians, arbitrators, inns of court when considering the conduct of one of their members [but see Lincoln v. Daniels, [1961] 3 All E.R. 740], and the General Medical Council when considering questions affecting the position of a medical man. In my opinion, it is unnecessary that such persons should be entitled to absolute immunity for anything they may say, and I do not think that the law of England gives them that protection; they are amply protected by the ordinary law of privilege. It should be borne in mind that there is a great difference between the constitution of those kinds of bodies and most courts. Courts are generally presided over by some person specially chosen because of his fitness for the place, and they generally have a fixed form of procedure which tends to minimise the risks that might result from this absolute immunity. These considerations do not apply to the bodies I have referred to. But further, there is no precedent for what has been contended for here, and I am, therefore, of opinion that the fact of a body having to decide judicially in the sense of acting fairly and impartially is not enough ground for the claim of absolute immunity which has been made. I wish here to make one observation, in order to prevent what I have said from being misunderstood. I have spoken of the immunity given to courts; but I do not wish to express any doubt that matters may be done judicially by a person acting as a member of a court, though not done by him while sitting in open court, as to which this immunity may exist. The point does not arise here. I only advert to it to prevent my being misunderstood. C
H

The question then arises whether the county council, when considering applications for music and dancing licences, were acting as a court, and whether the defendant was acting as a judge or member of that court. The first of those two questions turns on the language of the Disorderly Houses Act, 1751, s. 2 of which authorises and empowers quarter sessions to grant music and dancing licences, as they in their discretion shall think proper, to places of entertainment in London and Westminster. That appears to me to confer on the magistrates an administrative power or duty. There are no words in the statute indicative of any particular mode of procedure or requiring them to hear and determine. I

A On the contrary, there is a direction that after the licence has been granted certain things shall be done in open court—

“every such licence shall be signed and sealed by the said justices in open court, and afterwards be publicly read by the clerk of the peace.”

B Those provisions are applicable to something which has previously been done by the magistrates in their private room, not in court in the eyes of the public. Therefore, the language of the Act and the discretion given by it show that the proceedings are administrative, not judicial, and so far as the Act provides the magistrates could proceed originally without any public hearing at all. We have been much pressed with the words “in their discretion” used in the Act, and it has been argued that these words mean “judicial discretion.” But it is not every discretion that is judicial. A statute of Henry VIII gave power to the justices of a county to levy such money as they should think by their discretion convenient and sufficient for the repairing of the county bridges, but it could not be contended that that discretion is judicial. There is nothing in the section which gives the magistrates a judicial discretion, though their power is to be exercised discreetly.

D Then comes the question whether there is anything in the Local Government Act, 1888, making any alteration in the matter. The conclusion I have arrived at is that it is quite clear from the language of the Act that it was intended to draw a broad line between the administrative and judicial functions of the magistrates, and to transfer the former to the county council while leaving the latter to the justices. The first section of the Act establishes a council for the management of the administrative business of the county, and s. 3 provides that to this council there shall be transferred the administrative business of the justices of the county in quarter sessions assembled, and it goes on to enumerate the kinds of business transferred, mentioning in para. (v) the licensing under any general Act of houses and other places for music and dancing. But the matter does not rest there, because s. 78 shows an intention to exclude from the transfer of the duties of the justices all their judicial powers. Subsection (2) provides that the transfer of powers and duties enacted by the Act shall not authorise any county council to exercise any jurisdiction under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or perform any judicial business or otherwise act as justices or a justice of the peace. The statute, therefore, so far from giving colour to the suggestion made on behalf of the defendant, clearly declares that the county council has no judicial functions. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that the meeting of the county council when the statements complained of were made was not a court, and the defendant is not entitled to the immunity which he claims.

Lastly, as to the question whether there was any evidence to go to the jury of express malice which would destroy the defendant's privilege. The figures alluded to by the defendant were produced before the jury, and evidence was given about them as to their dresses and the nature of their performance which might have induced the jury to believe that the defendant could not have come honestly to the conclusion at which he said he had arrived. I express no opinion whether I should have come to the same conclusion as the jury. There was evidence for them, and they have found malice. The application fails on all the grounds that have been put forward, and must be dismissed. With regard to R. v. London County Council (2), I think that the judgment proceeded on the ground that the county council was bound to act fairly and impartially. It does not decide that the county council is a court.

LOPES, L.J.—This is a most important case, and though I agree with the able and exhaustive judgment of HAWKINS, J., and with those just delivered, I desire to give my reasons for so doing. The plaintiffs bring their action against the defendant for slanderous words used about them in respect of their business. The defendant says the action is not maintainable on three grounds: first, because the slanderous words are absolutely privileged, he being a member of the county council; secondly, if not absolutely privileged, they are privileged to a qualified extent, or sub modo—that is, being uttered on a privileged occasion, they are not actionable unless express malice is proved, and that of such malice there is no evidence; thirdly, that he is entitled to notice of action under the Justices Protection Act, 1848, s. 9 [repealed], and that no such notice of action has been given. A

These grounds must be considered separately. First, with regard to the absolute immunity claimed by way of privilege. Privilege or immunity in respect of defamation is of two kinds—absolute privilege, which is conceded to members of the Houses of Parliament, judges, etc.; and qualified privilege, to which every subject of the Queen is entitled, provided that the occasion on which the defamatory matter is written or spoken is privileged, and that there is an absence of express malice. The first seems rather to attach to the person or character of the person writing or speaking the defamatory matter; the second to the occasion when the defamatory matter is written or spoken. The authorities establish beyond all question that neither party, witness, counsel, jury, nor judge, can be put to answer civilly or criminally for words spoken in office; that no action of libel or slander lies, whether against judges, counsel, witnesses, or parties, for words written or spoken in the course of any proceeding before any court recognised by law, and this though the words written or spoken were written or spoken maliciously, without any justification or excuse, and from personal ill-will and anger against the person defamed. This absolute privilege has been conceded on the grounds of public policy to ensure freedom of speech where it is essential that freedom of speech should exist, and with the knowledge that courts of justice are presided over by those who from their high character are not likely to abuse the privilege, and who have the power and ought to have the will, to check any abuse of it by those who appear before them. It is, however, a privilege that ought not to be extended. It belongs, in my opinion, to courts recognised by law, and to such courts only. B

It was contended that so confining the absolute privilege was contrary to the decision of Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1). That contention cannot be supported. The foundation of the decision is that the court of inquiry in that case was a tribunal constituted, sanctioned, and recognised by law. KELLY, C.B., says (L.R. 8 Q.B. at p. 266): C

“A court of inquiry, though not a court of record nor a court of law, nor coming within the ordinary definition of a court of justice, is nevertheless a court duly and legally constituted, and recognised in the articles of war and many Acts of Parliament.” D

Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1), therefore, forms no exception to the general rule which I have stated. E

The defendant contends that the Local Government Act, 1888, has conferred this absolute privilege upon members of the county council, because there has been transferred to them by that Act certain business of the quarter sessions in respect of which they have judicial duties to perform. The word “judicial” has two meanings. It may refer to the discharge of duties exercisable by a judge or by justices in court, or to administrative duties which need not be performed in court, but in respect of which it is necessary to bring to bear a judicial mind—that is, a mind to determine what is fair and just in respect of the matters under consideration. Justices, for instance, act judicially when administering the law in court, and they also act judicially when determining in their private room what is right and fair in some administrative matter brought before them, as, for instance, levying a rate. F

It becomes, therefore, necessary to consider the Local Government Act, 1888. The material sections are ss. 3, 28, and 78. Section 3 transfers to the county council the administrative business of the justices of the county in quarter sessions G

A assembled. It is admitted that all that is transferred by this section is administrative business, business which was transacted out of court by the quarter sessions, except under sub-s. (5) of s. 3, viz., the licensing of houses and other places for music and dancing, which is the matter with which we are especially concerned in this case, and with which I will deal later on. Section 28 gives to the county council in respect of the business transferred, taking it shortly and calling in B aid the definition of "powers" in s. 100, all the privileges and immunities which the quarter sessions, or any committee thereof, or any justice or justices, had in respect of the business transferred. The proviso contained in the second part of s. 78 is material. It runs thus :

C "Provided that the transfer of powers and duties enacted by this Act shall not authorise any county council, or any committee or member thereof, (a) to exercise any of the powers of a court of record; or (b) to administer an oath; or (c) to exercise any jurisdiction under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, or to perform any judicial business, or otherwise act as justices or a justice of the peace."

D I understand that the legislature intended that all the administrative business of the quarter sessions was to be transferred to the county council, and they were in all respects to be placed in the same position as the justices had previously occupied with respect to that administrative business, and in respect of it were to enjoy the same privileges and immunities which the justices had previously enjoyed, but they were not to have any jurisdiction to perform any duties which the justices discharged in court. That part of the judicial business E of justices of the peace was to remain undisturbed in the justices. If this is a correct view, the county council did not acquire the absolute privilege now contended for. The justices never had it when discharging administrative duties in their private room. They could only invoke it when administering the law in court. The county council have not that jurisdiction to which only the absolute privilege can attach.

F But it is said that s. 3 of the Local Government Act, 1888, transferred to the county council the licensing of houses and other places for music and for dancing under the Disorderly Houses Act, 1751, which is not administrative business, but business to be transacted by the justices in court. The Local Government Act deals with it as administrative business, and so calls it; and s. 78 (2) says that the county council are not to perform any judicial business, by which I G understand, having regard to the terms of that proviso, any business such as is performed by justices in court. But did the Act of 1751 contemplate any proceedings in court? Was it not rather an application to the justices in their private room that was intended? Section 2 says that the justices are hereby authorised and empowered to grant such licences as they in their discretion shall think proper, signified under the hands and seals of four justices. Every licence H is to be signed and sealed by the justices in open court, and afterwards publicly read by the clerk of the peace, together with the names of the justices subscribing the same. This leads me to the conclusion that the granting of the licence was not a proceeding in court, and was for that reason published afterwards in open court in the way prescribed. Section 4 of the Act excludes from the operation of the Act certain theatres and licences of the Lord Chamberlain. I I believe the jurisdiction to be exercised by the justices under s. 2 was very similar to the jurisdiction exercised by the Lord Chamberlain. Nothing but administrative business, therefore, was transferred to the county council, and the business with regard to licences for music and dancing forms no exception. The conclusion at which I arrive is, that the defendant is not entitled to the absolute privilege he claims, and his first ground for impeaching the judgment fails.

The defendant's second ground for impeaching the judgment is that there was no evidence of malice which ought to have been left to the jury. The slanderous words complained of were uttered in the course of a debate with regard to the propriety of granting the plaintiffs a licence for music and dancing. The occasion was privileged, and the learned judge so held. Not only must the occasion create the privilege, but the occasion must be made use of bona fide and without malice. The defendant is only entitled to the protection of the privilege if he uses the occasion in accordance with the purpose for which the occasion arose. He is not entitled to the protection of the privilege if he uses the occasion for some indirect or wrong motive. This casts upon the plaintiffs the burden of proving express malice, or malice in fact. If it be proved that out of anger, or for some other wrong motive, the defendant has stated as true that which he does not know to be true, and he has stated it not stopping or taking the trouble to ascertain whether it is true or not—stated it recklessly by reason of his anger or other indirect motive—the jury may infer that he used the occasion not for the reason which justifies it, but for the gratification of his anger or other indirect motive. Applying this principle to this case, I think there was evidence which justified the jury in their finding of malice. The defendant, as he states, “was on the look-out, and disapproved of music-halls and theatres;” he was “a long way from the stage and only had an imperfect opportunity of seeing the performance.” He was only there once. It was admitted that the indecent action complained of would not be indecent if the figure in question was a male, though it would be indecent if a female. It was proved beyond dispute that the figure in question was a male, and there is a considerable body of evidence which is uncontradicted to show that no person viewing the performance with an unprejudiced eye, and using that amount of caution and circumspection which everybody ought to exercise before defaming another, could possibly make a mistake as to its sex. The figures were produced, and the jury saw them. I am unable, in such circumstances, to say that there was no evidence upon which a jury might reasonably find that, to say the least, the defendant visited the Aquarium with a mind unduly inclined to mark iniquity, and subsequently stated as true that which he did not know to be true, recklessly, not taking the trouble to ascertain whether it was true or not, and did this by reason of his objection to places of amusement like the Aquarium. If the jury so thought, they were justified in finding malice. A

[His LORDSHIP said that the repealed s. 9 of the Justices Protection Act, 1848, did not apply, and concluded:] The judgment for the plaintiffs must, therefore, stand, and this application must be dismissed with costs. With regard to Akkersdyk's Case (2), I do not think that the decision there has any application to the present case. It proceeded on the principle that no person who is bound to act fairly in respect of a matter can act as an accuser and also as a judge at the same time. G

JOHN YOUNG &amp; CO. v. BANKIER DISTILLERY CO.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Herschell, L.C., Lord Watson, Lord Ashbourne, Lord Macnaghten, Lord Morris and Lord Shand), June 12, 13, July 27, 1893]

Water—Riparian rights—Right of lower riparian owner to restrain upper riparian owner from pumping water into stream from underground—Water rendered unfit for purpose of lower riparian owner.

A lower proprietor must submit to the flow of water which comes down upon his lands by the natural force of gravitation from higher lands, whether flowing in a defined channel or not, or above or below the surface; but he is not bound to receive water pumped from below the surface by artificial means, which would never have reached his land by the ordinary force of gravitation.

The respondents were owners of a distillery situated on the banks of a stream, the water of which they used for the purposes of their business. The appellants were the owners of coal mines higher up the stream. In the course of working their mines the appellants pumped large quantities of water from the lower strata into the stream. The water so pumped in, although pure, was hard, and, although it did not affect the water in the stream for ordinary purposes, it rendered it much less suitable for distilling purposes.

Held: the respondents were not bound to receive water brought to the surface of the appellants' land by artificial means, and the appellants had no right to continue to pump water into the stream to their prejudice.

Appeal from a decision of the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, consisting of the Lord President (ROBERTSON), LORDS McLAREN, ADAM and KINNEAR, in favour of the respondents, the plaintiffs, below, in an action brought to have the appellants interdicted from discharging the water from their coal workings into a stream called the Doups Burn.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 27, 1893. The following opinions were read.

LORD WATSON.—The facts of this case, which may be stated shortly, give rise to a question of general importance.

The respondents are owners, under a feu right which excepts minerals, of a parcel of land in the county of Stirling, bounded on the west by a small stream, known as the Doups Burn, which has its course from north to south. A distillery was erected by their predecessors in the feu, and has been in use ever since. The appellants are tenants of the reserved coal below the feu, and of a considerable tract of the adjoining coal seams. In the course of their mineral workings they raise water by pumping from a pit on the north, which they discharge into the Doups Burn before it reaches the respondents' land. So far the facts do not appear to have been disputed in the court below.

Upon the evidence the learned judges of the First Division have unanimously held, and I see no reason to differ from their conclusions: (i) that the water added by means of the appellants' pumping operations could never reach the burn, either before or while it flows along the respondents' feu, if it were left to the law of gravitation; (ii) that the water of the burn is pure and soft in quality; (iii) that the added water, though pure, is hard in quality; (iv) that the addition is of volume sufficient to make the water of the burn, as it passes the respondents' land, hard instead of soft; and (v) that the hard water so produced is much less suitable for distilling than the naturally soft water of the burn.

From the judgment delivered by the Lord President it appears that the respondents in maintaining their right to have the appellants interdicted from discharging the pit water into the Doups Burn, presented their case in two different aspects. In the first place, they complained of the quality of the pit water on the same footing as if it had been water taken from the burn, used by the appellants for some secondary purpose, and then returned to the stream in a pure but hard condition. In the second place, they complained that the pit water, which could not find its way to the burn in the natural course of events, had been introduced by artificial means to their prejudice.

Upon the first hypothesis their Lordships' decision was in favour of the appellants. They appear to have affirmed that it is the right of a riparian proprietor not only to use water for secondary purposes, but in so using it to alter its chemical properties to any extent, so long as he does not render it impure in the sense of being unfit for primary uses. To that view of the law I am not prepared to assent. It was not necessary to decide the point, and its decision is unnecessary for the disposal of this appeal. But seeing that it was decided, I think it right to say that I am not satisfied that a riparian owner is entitled to use water for secondary purposes, except upon the condition that he shall return it to the stream practically undiminished in volume, and with its natural qualities unimpaired. I am not satisfied that, in returning the water in a state fit for primary uses, he has any right to alter its natural character, and so make it unfit for uses to which it had been put, or might be put, by a riparian proprietor below.

Upon the second contention their Lordships decided against the appellants, and granted interdict accordingly. The ratio of their decision is very clearly and forcibly stated by the Lord President, with whose opinion I entirely concur. The right of the upper heritor to send down, and the corresponding obligation of the lower heritor to receive, natural water, whether flowing in a definite channel or not, and whether upon or below the surface, are incidents of property arising from the relative levels of their respective lands and the strata below them. The lower heritor cannot object so long as the flow, whether above or below ground, is due to gravitation, unless it has been unduly increased by operations which are in æmulationem vicini. But he is under no legal obligation to receive foreign water brought to the surface of his neighbour's property by artificial means; and I can see no distinction in principle between water raised from a mine below the level of the surface of either property, which is the case here, and water conveyed artificially from a distant stream.

The law of Scotland upon this point is the same as that of England. In Blair v. Hunter, Finlay & Co. (1), LORD GIFFORD said (9 Macph. (Ct. of Sess.) at p. 207):

"Although there is a natural servitude on lower heritors to receive the natural or surface water from higher grounds, the flow must not be increased by artificial means, although reasonable drainage operations are permissible."

The rule that the upper heritor cannot interfere with the gravitation of the water

A so as to make it more injurious to the land below is clearly stated by ERLE, C.J., in Baird v. Williamson (2), which was rightly accepted by the First Division as establishing a principle conclusive of the present case. Against that principle the appellants were only able to cite one American case, Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson (3), which I do not notice further, because it was decided upon the express ground that in so far as concerns the present question the law of Pennsylvania differs essentially from the law of England. I therefore move that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed, with costs.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., and LORD ASHBOURNE concurred.

LORD MACNAGHTEN. This case has been very fully and ably argued on the part of the appellants. It is said to be a case of general importance, and it certainly contains an element of novelty. But the question involved in it is not, I think, attended with any difficulty. The law relating to the rights of riparian proprietors is well settled. A riparian proprietor is entitled to have the water of the stream, on the banks of which his property lies, flow down as it has been accustomed to flow down to his property, subject to the ordinary use of the flowing water by upper proprietors, and to such further use, if any, on their part in connection with their property as may be reasonable under the circumstances. Every riparian proprietor is thus entitled to the water of his stream in its natural flow without sensible diminution or increase, and without sensible alteration in its character or quality. Any invasion of this right causing actual damage, or calculated to found a claim which may ripen into an adverse right, entitles the party injured to the intervention of the court.

The respondents are riparian proprietors in regard to the Doups Burn. They carry on the business of distillers on their property by means of a distillery which has been at work there for the last sixty years. The appellants, without any prescriptive right so to do, are pouring into the burn a large body of water which they pump up from their mines. The respondents do not complain of the increased volume of the stream. The increase in itself is no disadvantage to them. But they say that the foreign water is of a quality different from that of the natural stream, and that it prejudicially affects the burn water for distilling purposes. The appellants insist that they are entitled to continue their operations, and therefore, although the respondents can, and do at present, protect themselves by taking their supply at a point higher up the stream, it is necessary to determine the question of right.

G It is proved that the water of the burn flowing past the respondents' property is less suitable for distilling purposes than it used to be. It used to be very soft water. It has been made very hard. The appellants have thus seriously impaired the manufacturing value of the burn. They have, in fact, destroyed its special value. Their answer is, that the ingredient introduced is only water, and very good water too. It may be very good water for some purposes; but that is not much satisfaction to the respondents, if it will not do for the one purpose for which they want to use it. It seems to me that the appellants have no more right to pour into the burn foreign water, which has the effect of changing its natural quality, than they would have to put into it some chemical substance which would produce a similar alteration.

I Then the appellants urged that working coal was the natural and proper use of their mineral property. They said they could not continue to work unless they were permitted to discharge the water which accumulated in their mine, and they added that this watercourse is the natural and proper channel to carry off the surplus water of the district. All that may be very true; but, in this country at any rate, it is not permissible in such a case for a man to use his own property so as to injure the property of his neighbour. I have therefore no doubt that the appellants are not justified in pouring into the burn foreign water to the injury of the respondents.

While I agree with the learned judges of the First Division in this, which is the ground of their decision, I am compelled to add that I am unable to concur in one proposition which their Lordships lay down as a proposition of law. They held that, if the particular change in the quality of the Doups Burn of which the respondents complain had been effected, not by the introduction of foreign water, but by some manufacturing process employed by an upper proprietor entitled to the use of the flowing stream, the respondents would have been without remedy. It is not necessary to decide the point. But, as at present advised, I am disposed to think that, if the appellants had abstracted the natural water of the burn, and had returned it to the stream so altered in quality or character as to be materially less serviceable for the reasonable use of the respondents, though still fit for primary or ordinary uses, they would have been equally liable to an interdict, just as they would be liable if they were to return water unchanged in its chemical constitution, but so changed in the temperature as to be injurious to a lower riparian proprietor. I therefore concur in the motion which has been proposed.

LORD MORRIS concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I concur in the opinions of my noble and learned friends. I fully share the doubts which have been expressed as to the right of any upper proprietor so to use the water of a stream as to affect injuriously its natural quality as restored to the bed to the prejudice of the lower riparian owner, even though the water restored should be fit for ordinary primary purposes. It is true that, in the cases which have hitherto occurred, both in Scotland and in this country, where the complaint has been of pollution by an upper heritor, the claim has been made that the water should be transmitted in such a state of purity as to be fit for the use of man and beast, and the other primary uses of running water, and that, where no prescriptive right to pollute has been proved, decree has been given to this effect. The object of the pursuers in these cases was served by having the pollution put down, and their right to the transmission of water, fit for primary purposes, declared. These cases do not, however, establish the proposition that, if a running stream should possess natural qualities which may be valuable to lower proprietors for some manufacture or otherwise, an upper proprietor using the water for his own purposes may deprive the water of those qualities, provided he restore it fit for ordinary primary uses. There seem to be strong reasons for holding that the lower owner is entitled to have the water transmitted to him with its natural qualities unimpaired, and that the principle of the cases which have given effect to the claim to have the water transmitted unimpaired in quality, and fit for primary purposes, would support that view. But, at all events, I am at present unable to assent to the view expressed by the learned judges in the Court of Session.

I am, however, clearly of opinion that, while a lower proprietor must submit to the flow of water coming down upon his lands by the natural force of gravitation, he is not bound to receive water brought up from a depth by artificial means, such as pumping. The appellants would, no doubt, be entitled in mining to excavate and remove the strata of minerals in the lands leased to them to any depth practicable to which they might choose to go. If in so doing, in the ordinary course of working, they should happen to tap springs or a water waste, from which the water by gravitation rose to the surface and flowed down to a lower proprietor's land, this must be submitted to; but the mine-owner is not entitled to increase this servitude or burden on one unwilling to submit to it by pumping up water which might never rise to the surface, or might only do so more gradually and slowly, and in much smaller volume. This is, I think, the rule or principle on which the court decided Baird v. Williamson (2), the decision in which has been approved of by your Lordships.

I know of no distinction between the law of Scotland and the law of England in the class of questions relating to the common interest and rights of upper and

A lower proprietors on the banks of a running stream. The whole series of authorities in both countries seems to be entirely against the claim or pretension of the appellants for their own profit to pump up water from the depths of their pits and send it into the stream, greatly enlarging the quantity of water in the bed, and impairing its quality. In these circumstances the appellants' counsel invited your Lordships to follow the decision in an American case, decided in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in February, 1866 (Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson (3)). In that case undoubtedly the court held that the owners of a mine were entitled to pump up water from the low strata of the mine, and to send it into an adjoining stream, although the quantity of the water was thereby increased, and its quality so affected as to render it totally unfit for use for domestic purposes by the lower riparian owners. The case had been twice previously before the court, and on both occasions the judgment was given against the mine-owner. On the third occasion, which arose in consequence of a third trial to assess the damages, the jury found a very large sum due to the lower owner; but the verdict was quashed, and the whole case was reconsidered with reference to the legal rights of the parties, and with the result which I have just stated. In a court of seven judges there were three who dissented from the judgment, including the Chief Justice of the State. This circumstance and the grounds of the judgment seem to me to be sufficient to deprive the case of any real weight. These grounds appear to me from a perusal of the judgment to be fairly stated in the head-note as follows:

E "The use and enjoyment of a stream of pure water for domestic purposes by the lower riparian owners, who purchased their land, built their houses, and laid out their grounds before the opening of the coal mine, the acidulated waters from which rendered the stream entirely useless for domestic purposes, must ex necessitate give way to the interests of the community, in order to permit the development of the natural resources of the country, and to make possible the prosecution of the lawful business of mining coal."

F I shall only add that, while the enormous value of the mining interests in the district of Pennsylvania from which the case came, which is fully explained in the judgment, might have formed a good reason for appealing to the legislature to pass a special measure to restrain any proceeding by interdict at the instance of surface owners, and to confine them to a right to damages only for injury sustained, that value could, in my opinion, afford no good legal ground for allowing the proprietor of a mine so to work his minerals for his own profit as to destroy or greatly injure his neighbour's estate, by subjecting it, by means of artificial operations, to the burden of receiving water enlarged in quantity and destroyed in quality, without payment of compensation or damages for the injury done. The case has no application to the present, because the decision was based on special circumstances as to the great relative value of the minerals as compared with the surface in the district; and because in any view the decision seems to me to have been making law rather than interpreting the law so as to give effect to sound, just, and well-recognised principles as to common interest, and rights of upper and lower proprietors in the running water of a stream.

Libel—Privilege—Qualified privilege—Privileged occasion—Publication to person having no duty, interest, or power in the matter—Bona fide belief by publisher that duty, interest, or power existed.

Where a defendant has published a defamatory document to a person who has no duty, or interest, or power to deal with the subject-matter of the libel, the occasion does not become privileged by reason of the fact that the defendant had at the time of the publication a bona fide and reasonable belief that that person had such duty, interest, or power.

The plaintiff was a candidate at an election of parish guardians and was elected to office. The defendants, who were electors, sent a letter to the board of guardians alleging improper conduct of the plaintiff in obtaining votes. The allegations proved to be untrue and libellous, but the defendants honestly believed that it was their duty to make them to the board.

Held: as the board of guardians could not set the election aside or give any redress to the defendants the fact that the defendants honestly believed that the board had a power or duty in the matter was immaterial and the occasion was not privileged.

Tompson v. Dashwood (1) (1883), 11 Q.B.D. 43, overruled.

Per LORD ESHER, M.R.: The proof that an occasion is privileged lies on the defendant, and if he proves it, then the burden is on the plaintiff to prove malice; but there is no need for him to prove malice until the defendant has first proved that the occasion when the libel was published was privileged. Whether or not an occasion is privileged is a question of law, a question for the judge, not for the jury.

Application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial of an action for libel by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., with a jury, at Taunton Assizes.

B The plaintiff had been a candidate at an election of guardians for the parish of South Petherton, in the county of Somerset, and was elected. After the election the defendants, who were electors, wrote and sent to the board of guardians a letter imputing to the plaintiff improper conduct in obtaining votes at the election, and asking for an investigation. The improper conduct alleged was the tampering with the voting papers, as they were handed in, by a person in the employ of the plaintiff, who was engaged in collecting the votes, and treating with drink at certain public-houses several of the voters. At the trial

C of the action VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., left the following questions to the jury: (i) Is the letter libellous? Answer: Yes. (ii) Is the plea of justification proved, either wholly or in part? Answer: No. The third question became unnecessary by reason of the jury's answer to the first. (iv) Did the defendants, and each of them, honestly believe it to be their duty to make each and all the communications in the letter, and did they each sign the letter under a sense of duty? Answer: In part. (v) Did the defendants, and each of them, honestly and reasonably believe that the board of guardians were the proper authority to whom to apply in respect of each and all of the matters mentioned in the letter? Answer: Yes. The learned judge then re-directed the jury as to the fourth

E question, and left them two questions in its place, referring to the two parts of the letter, the questions in each case being: Did the defendants write that under a sense of duty and believing the board to be the proper persons to write to? Answer as to the first part, Yes; as to the second part, No. Upon that the learned judge ruled that the occasion was not wholly privileged, and said he would put no question as to malice. He then directed the jury to find the amount of damages. The jury returned a verdict of £10 damages, and the learned judge

F gave judgment for the plaintiff accordingly. The defendants now moved for judgment or a new trial.

G LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff has brought an action of libel against the defendants for writing and publishing with regard to the plaintiff that when he was a candidate in an election of guardians of the poor he had bribed some of the electors. Such an action as that consists not merely in writing a libel, but in writing and publishing, and the material point is the publication of what has been written. In this case it has been proved to the satisfaction of

H the jury that the defendants wrote a document which was libellous on the plaintiff, and that they published it to the board of guardians. The defendants argue that though that may be so, yet the libel was published on a privileged occasion, and that the plaintiff had not proved malice. The proof that an occasion was privileged lies on the defendant, and if he proves it, then the burden is on the plaintiff to prove malice; but there is no need for him to prove malice until the defendant

I has first proved that the occasion when the libel was published was privileged. Whether or not an occasion is privileged is a question of law, a question for the judge, not for the jury.

The facts in the present case upon which the question of law, whether or no the occasion was privileged, has to be determined are these. The plaintiff had been a candidate, and had been elected at this election of guardians. The defendants are persons who had a right to vote at this election and after the election was over they sent the defamatory letter to the board of guardians, and this is the publication relied on. It is clear that the board could do nothing.

They could not set aside the election or do anything in the matter. That being so, the first question for the judge at the trial was whether the defendants had an interest in the matter. I am not prepared to say that they had not. I am inclined to think that they had, because they were electors, but for the purposes of this judgment I will assume that they had an interest. The next question is, were the board of guardians interested? I think they were not. It seems to me that they had no duty or power to move in the matter. Under these circumstances it seems to me perfectly clear that the occasion was not privileged.

To that the defendants reply that, though the board of guardians may not have had any interest or duty in the matter, nevertheless the occasion was privileged because the defendants believed honestly and reasonably, or not unreasonably, that the board of guardians had a power or duty in the matter, and were able to give the defendants some redress, and that was the reason why the defendants sent the letter to the board. I cannot accept that proposition. In what way can the belief of the defendants, who have made a mistake and published a libellous document to certain persons who have no interest or duty or power in the matter, affect the question whether the occasion of the publication was privileged? It is true that the belief of the defendants may be important upon the question of malice, but if the occasion was not in any other respect privileged I cannot see what is the importance of the defendants' belief.

However, the argument was put forward as being based upon authority. I do not think that any court has decided the point which has been argued here, but certainly it has not been so decided by the Court of Appeal. It is unnecessary for us to justify our decision by a minute discussion of all the cases that have been cited in the argument. The first case relied on is Waring v. McCaldin (2), and FITZGERALD, B., no doubt used an expression in that case which justified its citation here, but I do not think he meant to decide the point. He says in his judgment:

"If without express malice I make a defamatory charge which I bona fide believe to be true against one whose conduct in the respect defamed has caused me injury, to one whose duty it is, or whose duty I reasonably believe it to be, to inquire into and redress such injury, the occasion is privileged."

The alternative there mentioned is what is relied on here. But is that the real judgment of the learned judge? Immediately before the sentence I have just read he said:

"The occasion of making a defamatory communication is thus privileged—when it is made by one having an interest in making, or a duty to make, that particular defamatory communication . . . to one having a corresponding interest or duty in respect of that subject-matter—that is to say, who has an interest in hearing, or a duty to arise upon hearing, such defamatory communication."

So that, having laid down the law correctly, he immediately after is supposed to lay down the proposition that the defendants' belief will make an occasion privileged. I cannot believe that the words relied upon are his real judgment, and I think he must have used them inadvertently. I do not think he meant to decide the proposition cited here for the defendants, but, if he did use these words purposely, I cannot agree with him.

The only case cited which is binding on us is Stuart v. Bell (3), which is a decision of the Court of Appeal; but I think that, when that case is looked into, it will be found to be an authority against the defendants' contention. After considering a number of cases, LINDLEY, L.J., then says ([1891] 2 Q.B. at p. 348):

"Now, adopting the language of ERLE, C.J., I ask, do the circumstances show that the statement complained of was made in the discharge of some social or moral duty, or that the speaker or the person addressed had an interest in making or receiving the communication?"

A He then discussed the question of the defendant's interest, and continued (ibid. at p. 349):

B "But the question still remains, whether the defendant was not under a moral or social duty to make such communication. Both the defendants and Stanley say that the defendants acted under a sense of duty, but this, though important on the question of malice, is not, I think, relevant to the question whether the occasion was or was not privileged. That question does not depend on the defendant's belief, but on whether he was right or mistaken in that belief."

C That seems to me distinct authority that the belief of the defendant at least is immaterial. Then Harrison v. Bush (4) was cited as an authority; but LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., there declined to give any opinion on the point, so that it seems to me that the case cannot be cited as an authority upon this question. M'Dougall v. Claridge (5) and Fairman v. Ives (6) were also cited, but from what was said by the Court of Common Pleas, when those cases were cited in Pearson v. Lemaitre (7), it appears that they are both within the ordinary rule, and do not assist the defendants here. The report also of Scarll v. Dixon (8) is not satisfactory.

D There is one case which seems to be in favour of the defendants' contention, and that is Tompson v. Dashwood (1). There, I think, the judges did draw a distinction between writing and publishing a libel; but, as I have said, the cause of action depends on the publication of the document, not on the writing of it. The only way in which that case can be dealt with is to say that we do not agree with it, and in my opinion it was wrongly decided. Therefore, with regard

E to the present case, when it was proved that the defendants had published this libel, and that the board of guardians to whom it was published had no interest, or duty, or power, to deal with the complaint made to them, then the judge ought, without more, to have held that the occasion was not privileged, and that there was no further question in the case except as to damages. Therefore, the last questions which the learned judge left to the jury were unnecessary and irrelevant,

F and it is immaterial what the findings of the jury upon them were. I am of opinion, upon the undisputed facts of this case, that the occasion was not privileged, and this application therefore fails, and must be dismissed.

G SMITH, L.J.—I agree that this application fails. The action is for libel, and the plaintiff established a prima facie case, namely, that the defendants had falsely and maliciously published a document which was defamatory of the plaintiff. The defendants in reply say that the occasion was privileged, and so seek to rebut the presumption of malice which the law implies on the publication of a libellous document. The question therefore arises, what constitutes a privileged occasion.

H The law was laid down by PARKE, B., in Toogood v. Spyring (9) and also by LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., in Harrison v. Bush (4). In the latter case it was laid down (5 E. & B. at p. 344) that

I "a communication made bona fide upon any subject-matter in which the party communicating has an interest or in reference to which he has a duty [and I will add here, whether legal, moral, or social] is privileged if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, although it contains criminary matter which, without this privilege, would be slanderous and actionable."

That is to say, there must be a corresponding duty or interest in the person sending and in the person receiving the libellous document. In this case it is clear that the board of guardians had no interest or duty in the matter complained of by the defendants, and therefore it follows that the libel was not published upon a privileged occasion. That was to a certain extent admitted, but it was argued that, though the communication was addressed to persons who had no interest or duty in the matter, nevertheless the occasion would be privileged if the defendants bona fide and reasonably believed that the board of guardians had some interest, duty, or power. That does not seem to me to be the law. The belief of a libeller cannot make an occasion privileged if it is not otherwise privileged. A

In Stuart v. Bell (3) LINDLEY, L.J., pointed out that the question of privilege does not depend on the defendant's belief, and I entirely agree with him there. Several cases were cited in support of the defendants' contention, but I must pass most of them by. The strongest case is Waring v. McCaldin (2), in which FITZGERALD, B., used the words which the Master of the Rolls has already read. I do not think that the passage in his judgment which is relied on is right in law. It seems to me, therefore, that my brother VAUGHAN WILLIAMS ought, at the trial of this action, to have ruled that the occasion was not privileged. No doubt he thought it safer to leave to the jury the later questions, but they were unnecessary. Even if we were wrong in the law which we are applying to this case, I think that on the findings of the jury the defendants would be out of court. I agree that this appeal ought to be dismissed. B C

DAVEY, L.J.—I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.—I agree also with what the Master of the Rolls has said with regard to Tompson v. Dashwood (1), and I think that the case cannot be supported. D

Upon the question whether the occasion of the publication of a libel is privileged, I cannot see how the state of the defendant's mind can of itself make any difference. I think it is unnecessary to discuss all the authorities that have been cited by the learned counsel for the defendants, because I think none of them, except Tompson v. Dashwood (1) are really in his favour, and Stuart v. Bell (3) in this court is against him. As to Waring v. McCaldin (2), I must say, with great respect to FITZGERALD, B., that I think the dictum that has been cited to us was uttered per incuriam, and cannot be supported. I agree that the appeal fails. E

TICHBORNE v. WEIR

B Landlord and Tenant—Repair—Liability of assignees of lease—Lessee out of possession for more than twenty years—Real Property Limitation Act, 1883 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 34.

C In 1802 D., the landlord's predecessor in title, granted to B. a lease for eighty-nine years of a house containing a covenant to repair. B. created an equitable mortgage of the lease by deposit with G., and in 1836 G. entered into possession, paid the landlord the rent agreed in the lease granted to B., and continued in possession until 1876, when by deed he assigned all his interest in the lease to the defendant who continued in possession and paid the same rent to the landlord until 1891, when he delivered up possession to the landlord. The landlord sued the defendant for breach of the covenant to repair contained in the lease granted to B.

D Held: the effect of s. 34 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 [now s. 16 of the Limitation Act, 1939], was not to transfer to G. the right and title of B., so that G. did not become subject to the covenant of the lease which he assigned to the defendant, but only to extinguish it by barring the remedy, and, consequently, the defendant was not liable under the covenant in the lease granted to B.

Appeal by the plaintiff's landlord from a decision of CAVE, J., without a jury, in an action by the landlord of a house in Gray's Inn Road for damages for breach of a covenant to repair against the defendant who had been in occupation as tenant and was, as the landlord claimed, liable on the covenants as assignee of the lease. CAVE, J., held that the lease never vested in the defendant and that the defendant was not liable on the covenants in the lease and gave judgment for the defendant. A

In 1802 the landlord's predecessor in title, Mrs. Doughty, who was owner in fee simple, granted a lease of the house to Baxter for a term of eighty-nine years at a yearly rent and this lease contained the covenant upon which the present action was brought. Baxter created an equitable mortgage of the lease by deposit with Giraud, and afterwards in 1836 Giraud entered into possession of the premises without any acknowledgment to Baxter, who disappeared in 1836. Giraud remained in possession for forty years till 1876, paying to the landlord the rent agreed in the lease to Baxter. In 1876, by a deed made between Giraud and the defendant reciting the lease granted by Mrs. Doughty to Baxter and reciting that the premises were at that time legally vested in Giraud for the rest of the term, Giraud assigned all his estate and interest in the lease to the defendant, who then entered into possession and continued paying the same rent as Giraud till the end of the term in 1891, when he delivered up possession of the premises to the landlord, the successor in title of Mrs. Doughty. B C

Section 34 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, provides :

"That at the determination of the period limited by this Act to any person for making an entry or distress, or bringing any writ of quare impedit or other action or suit, the right and title of such person to the land, rent, or advowson for the recovery whereof such entry, distress, action, or suit respectively might have been made or brought within such period, shall be extinguished." D

Murphy, Q.C., and Hadley for the landlord.

Channell, Q.C., and Chester Jones for the defendant, were not called on to argue. E

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The real point argued before us in this case is, whether the effect of s. 34 of the Real Property Limitations Act, 1833, has been to transfer the lease formerly held by Baxter to Giraud, who for over twenty years had been in possession of the land without any acknowledgment to Baxter, who had equitably mortgaged the lease to him. The question is whether Giraud became subject to the covenants of the lease, and whether he has assigned the lease to the defendant. If the statute transferred the lease to Giraud, then Giraud became tenant of the landlord whether the landlord liked it or not. Reliance was placed on the words of the section, though it says not a word about transferring anything to anybody; it merely says the right "shall be extinguished." If that is all, the right of the man out of possession is extinguished so that he cannot eject the man who is in possession, but nothing is given to the latter by the statute. As no one can turn out the man in possession, his possession is the same in effect, as LORD ST. LEONARDS says in Incorporated Society in Dublin v. Richards (1), as if he had a title conveyed to him. F G

But it is argued that cases have decided that a title is transferred by the statute. It is not said that there is any reported case which clearly decides that Giraud became under the statute a transferee of the lease; but it is contended that judges have used words which show that such is the case. The landlord relies on phrases used by LORD ST. LEONARDS, a very great real property lawyer; but they were used when he was speaking of a fee simple, and when no question was raised about a lease. The opinions of well-known writers of conveyancing textbooks are also opposed to the contentions put forward on behalf of the plaintiff. Textbooks written by living authors who are practising barristers are not quoted in the courts, but passages have been read from two books of great authority. HAYES in his own marginal note says in his book on CONVEYANCING (6th Edn.), vol. 1, p. 269: "The statute does not convey but destroys the right." Therefore, the matter comes to this. The words of the statute do not carry the proposition which is contended for, the reason of the thing is against it, there is an absence of judicial authority, and the views of well-known textbook writers are uniformly against it. All these reasons show that the effect of the statute is not that the right of one person is I

A conveyed to another, but that the right is extinguished and destroyed. That being so, the judgment of CAVE, J., is right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the whole of the argument addressed to us depends on the proposition that the statute transferred Baxter's rights and liabilities as against the landlord to Giraud. I think that the statute makes no transfer of any kind. Section 34 of the Real Property Limitations Act, 1833, says that, at the determination of the period limited by the Act to any person for making an entry or distress or bringing any writ of quare impedit or other action or suit, the right and title of such person to the land (which word includes a chattel interest) for the recovery whereof such entry, distress, action, or suit respectively might have been made or brought within such period, shall be extinguished. It is argued that the extinguishment of the title must have the effect of transferring the term to the man in possession, although there is no mention in the statute of any transfer.

The argument is really an overstraining of the words used by LORD ST. LEONARDS in Incorporated Society in Dublin v. Richards (1) and of PARKE, B., in Doe d. Jukes v. Sumner (2), and a construing of them to mean more than what is said in the Act. It is true that the effect of the statute is not only to bar the remedy, but also to extinguish the title of the person out of possession, and in that sense the person in possession holds by virtue of the Act, but not by a fiction of a transfer of title. In DART'S VENDORS AND PURCHASERS (6th Edn.), vol. 1, p. 463, it is stated that "Possession for a time exceeding the statutory limit not only bars the remedy, but also extinguishes the right of the original owner. It has been said that the effect of the Act is to make a parliamentary conveyance of the land to the person in possession after the statutory period has elapsed; but though it is true that the possessory owner, after the statutory limit has been passed, is placed by the Act in a position analogous to that which he would have occupied if the fee simple had been absolutely conveyed to him, yet his title under the Act is acquired solely by the extinction of the right of the prior rightful owner; not by any statutory transfer of the estate. If the statute operated as a sort of involuntary alienation of the estate of the rightful owner, the adverse possessor would take it subject to the subsisting charges; and wherever it was in settlement, his interest therein would constantly be varying according to the successive limitations of the settlement; but this is clearly not the operation of the statute."

Similar language is used in HAYES ON CONVEYANCING, p. 269, and the reasoning there given is entirely germane to the matter. He says :

"We must not, however, confound the negative effect of the statute with the positive effect of a conveyance. In the example last considered, the rights of A. and B. do not become the rights of C. under a species of involuntary alienation effected by the statute. If that hypothesis were adopted, it would follow that, when the bar became complete as against A., the tenant for life, C. acquired a lawful estate pur autre vie; in short, that where the land is in settlement the adverse possessor would be from time to time invested with interests measured by those of the successive takers, whether chattel or freehold, and consequently be owner today of a short term of years, tomorrow, of the fee. Such is not the operation of the statute."

That language is used in reference to a fee simple, but here we have not to deal with the fee.

From 1802 to the present time nothing has been done to bar any right of the original lessor. Giraud never acquired the fee simple, it was only as against Baxter that he acquired anything. The most that can be said is, that he acquired an absolute title to the land as against everybody but the landlord. He was not liable on the covenants in the lease. The arguments used in the books which I have read support the only view consistent with the statute. Only in one metaphorical sense can the section be said to give a title to land. Then there is another point arising out of the payment of rent to the landlord. It was said that the defendant had estopped himself, by paying the rent agreed upon in the lease to Baxter, from saying that he had not accepted the term. If a man pays rent to the landlord on the footing of accepting a term and the liabilities under it, and the landlord accepts the rent on those conditions, then such a person might be estopped from denying that he has become tenant to the landlord on those conditions. But the terms of payment of the rent in this case fall short of showing that the defendant meant to stand for all purposes in the shoes of the original lessee. The landlord has his rights against Baxter on his covenants, but not against the defendant, unless the defendant has taken the lease by assignment or has estopped himself from denying that he is assignee of the term. There is nothing here to show any such estoppel.

KAY, L.J.—This is an action on a covenant in a lease to restore the demised premises in a good state of repair. The lease was created in 1802 and terminated in June, 1891. The lessor, Mrs. Doughty, was the landlord's predecessor in title of the fee simple. The lessee, Baxter, deposited the lease by way of equitable mortgage with Giraud, and in 1836 Giraud entered into possession of the land. Baxter then disappeared altogether. Giraud remained in possession till 1876, when he executed a deed which recited the lease of 1802, but then, instead of going on to say as usual "by divers mesne assignments etc.," it continued, "whereas the said premises legally vested in the said Giraud for the rest of the term." Giraud then assigned his interest in the rest of the term subject to the conditions and covenants of the original lease. The lessor was not a party to this deed. The deed shows that Giraud had not the ordinary title which the assignee of a lease usually has, though it raises a presumption that the lease was assigned to him. On the occasion of the conveyance Giraud made a statement that he had no assignment of the lease, but only a title by a possession of forty years. The question is, what is the effect of that title.

There is no doubt that covenants running with the land would bind anyone coming into possession of the estate which Baxter had, and if the lease is anyhow vested in the defendant, he would be bound by such covenants. Therefore, the question is, whether Baxter's estate is vested in the defendant. It was argued that the effect of the statute was to transfer the term from Baxter to Giraud, and so it would be vested in the defendant. Under the Real Property Limitations Act, 1833, s. 34, "the right and title" of Baxter "to the land" (which by the interpretation clause includes chattel interest) was "extinguished." That is the operation of the section, and we are now asked to construe the Act so as to make it say that Baxter's right and title was transferred to Giraud. There is no authority for saying that this is the meaning of the Act. Great textbook writers may be quoted to show the general opinion of the profession at the time. MR. DART and MR. HAYES are quite opposed to the correctness of the argument now put forward. Passages have been read from judgments in which the word "transfer" has certainly been used. But in the first case cited, Incorporated Society in Dublin v. Richards (1), the word is used by LORD ST. LEONARDS just after he had used the word "extinguished;" and even if the detached sentences relied on be carefully read they are quite consistent with a meaning different from that which is attributed to them by the argument. The defendant got an estate in the land which he has admitted, by paying rent, is not the fee simple, and by operation of the statute Baxter's right to claim the term was extinguished. It follows that Giraud during the rest of the term was free from liability to Baxter or anyone claiming under him, but it does not follow that he acquired Baxter's estate.

There is another point as to whether the defendant is estopped from denying that he was in possession of Baxter's lease. He admits he is in possession of the

- A land, he and Giraud have paid the rent agreed on in the lease of 1802, and they have claimed possession for the rest of the term. The landlord's title to the land has been completely admitted, but there is no other evidence of the defendant's being bound by all the terms of the lease, or of his holding all Baxter's estate. There being no such admission, either express or implied, we must hold that there is no evidence of such an extensive estoppel as that which has been contended for.
- B I think that the defendant, for the reasons I have stated, is not liable on the covenants in the lease, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

RAMSAY v. MARGRETT

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Davey, L.JJ.), March 9, 1894]

Bill of Sale—Receipt of purchase money—Not part of transaction which passed goods—"Apparent possession"—Sale of goods by husband to wife—Goods remaining in house—Possession consistent with that of either husband or wife—Possession attributed to wife who had legal title—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict., c. 31), s. 4, s. 8.

F

A wife, who was living in the same house as her husband, agreed to buy his furniture and effects, and paid a fair price for them. Subsequently, the husband signed an ordinary receipt for the goods in which he acknowledged that the goods were the absolute property of the wife. The goods remained in use in the house which they both continued to occupy.

G

Held: (i) the receipt was not part of the transaction which passed the property in the goods, and, therefore, it was not a bill of sale within the meaning of s. 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, so as to require registration under that Act.

H

(ii) (per LORD ESHER, M.R., and DAVEY, L.J.) even if the receipt had been a bill of sale within s. 4 of the Act, the goods were not within the apparent possession of the husband within s. 8 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, since, as the goods remained in the house, their possession was consistent with either that of husband or wife, and possession must be attributed to the wife who had the legal title.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of WRIGHT, J., at the trial of an interpleader issue, without a jury.

The plaintiff, Lady Ramsay, the wife of Sir Alexander Ramsay, claimed to be F entitled to certain furniture, plate and effects which had been taken in execution by the defendant, a judgment creditor of Sir Alexander Ramsay. WRIGHT, J., held that there had been a bona fide sale of the furniture, plate and effects by the husband to his wife, that a receipt which he gave her for the purchase price was intended to be only an ordinary receipt and was not part of the transaction of the sale of the goods, and that the receipt was not a bill of sale within s. 4 of the G Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and did not require registration thereunder. He gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Sir Alexander and his wife, the plaintiff, lived together in a house which was taken in his name, though she paid the rent. The furniture and plate which were in use in the house belonged to him. In August, 1892, as he was in financial H difficulties, she agreed to buy the furniture and plate, and paid him £1,700 out of her separate estate, that being the full value of the goods. After the money was paid, Sir Alexander signed and gave to the plaintiff the following receipt, which had been drawn up by the plaintiff's solicitor :

"Received . . . Aug. 8, 1892, from [the plaintiff] . . . £1,200, making, with . . .
 £500 paid to me on 3rd instant, the sum of £1,700 in payment of the agreed purchase money for all my furniture, plate, . . . and other household and I garden effects at [the house], which I hereby acknowledge are now absolutely her property."

After the sale the goods continued to be used in the house as before. This receipt was not registered as a bill of sale.

The defendant, a judgment creditor of Sir Alexander Ramsay, having levied execution upon the furniture, an interpleader issue was ordered to be tried and from the judgment in this issue the defendant appealed.

A Herbert Reed, Q.C., and A. T. Lawrence for the defendant.
Douglas Walker, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie for the plaintiff.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The first question in this case is as to the real meaning of the judgment of WRIGHT, J. This was an interpleader issue which he tried without a jury, so that upon any question of fact his decision is in precisely the same position as a finding of a jury.

B The facts which he found were these. The plaintiff, Lady Ramsay, was a married woman who had separate property of her own. Her husband was in debt, and she agreed with him honestly to buy from him certain furniture and plate which was in the house where they both lived. She did not bargain about the price, she gave him their full value so that he might pay his creditors. He having agreed to

C sell for a fair price, she paid him the money, and either then or soon afterwards—it is not clear when exactly—she asked for a receipt. The learned judge found that what she asked for was “an ordinary receipt,” that is to say, a receipt for the money she had paid. The receipt was drawn up for her by her solicitor, and so far as it goes it is a receipt, but at the end of it he put an acknowledgment by the husband that he had sold the goods to her. I see no reason to doubt the judge’s

D finding as to those facts. There was nothing suspicious about any of the persons concerned, and both the husband and wife seem to me to be perfectly truthful, and, moreover, it is perfectly clear from other evidence that the plaintiff did in fact pay the money to her husband.

What is the law applicable to those facts? It is argued that, though the facts are as I have stated, yet a creditor of the husband is entitled to levy an execution on these goods, not on the ground that the wife did not pay for them, not on the ground that the husband did not really intend to pass any property to her by the sale, but on the ground that the document which he gave her is within s. 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. That document is not really a bill of sale, that is to say, a document by which the property in certain chattels is intended to pass from one person to another. But there are some documents which, though not really bills of sale, are deemed to be bills of sale within the Act. The last case of authority upon that is Charlesworth v. Mills (1) in the House of Lords. A rule was there laid down by LORD HALSBURY, L.C., and LORD HERSCHELL to this effect, that if the document in question is intended by the parties to be part of the bargain which is to pass the property in the goods, then, whatever be its form, it is to be deemed to be a bill of sale though it may not really be so. If the document is not

G part of the bargain, if the bargain which passes the property is complete without the document, then the document is not to be deemed to be a bill of sale. That is the test to be applied. An ordinary receipt for money which has been paid for goods sold is not part of the bargain which passes the property in the goods. If the giving of a receipt had been a condition precedent to the payment of the

H money, it would be a part of the bargain; but when after the goods are sold the buyer simply asks for a receipt for the money he has paid, the receipt is no part of the contract, and, according to the rule laid down in the House of Lords, it is not to be deemed to be a bill of sale. In this case WRIGHT, J., has found as a fact that the receipt was nothing more than an ordinary receipt for money paid, and upon that finding alone, as the receipt was not intended by the parties to be any

I part of the bargain by which the property passed, this document is not to be deemed to be a bill of sale within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

It was further argued that the creditor was entitled to seize these goods in execution under s. 8 of the Act of 1878 because they were in the “apparent possession” of the husband. But that section speaks of the “apparent possession of the person making such bill of sale,” so that until that person has given a bill of sale he is not within that section. As I have already said, I do not think that this receipt is a bill of sale within s. 4 of the Act of 1878, and consequently no question arises here as to apparent possession. That is enough to decide this case.

However, if it were necessary to decide whether possession of the goods was given to the plaintiff, I should say that in my opinion it had been given. This particular point could not have arisen before the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, because up to that time married women could not at law have any separate property. Formerly, if a married woman was entitled to any property it was held by trustees for her, it was not hers simply. If personal property was left to her simply, it became her husband's. Since the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, such property will remain the property of the wife, and does not pass to the husband. So far as personal property is concerned, a husband and wife are now in the same position as two men would be. In the present case we have a wife with money and a husband with furniture, and, upon a proper bargain being made, the furniture became hers and her separate property. The furniture was in the house in which the husband and wife were living together, so that you could not tell which of them was in actual possession. What is the rule of law under those circumstances? When the possession is doubtful, the law will attach it to the property, so that since the property of the goods is in the wife, the possession also will be in her. That would be enough to settle this case. So that, in either view, whether this receipt is a bill of sale or not, the judgment of WRIGHT, J., is correct, and this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The learned judge at the trial found that the transaction between the husband and wife was bona fide, and the document given was an ordinary receipt and not an "assurance." A question has been raised whether possession of the goods in question passed from the husband to the wife, who was living with him in the same house, but I decline to give any opinion on that question because I think it is unnecessary to the case. Upon the other point, the question is whether the document was an "assurance." Was it part of the transaction by which the property in the goods passed from the husband to the wife? There are several tests by which that question may be tried. Is it necessary to look at the document in order to show the wife's title to the goods? I think not. Need she have proved the document in order to prove her title? I think not. Was the document intended to pass the property? I think not. The last case upon this point is Charlesworth v. Mills (1). LORD HERSCHELL there says ([1892] A.C. at p. 241):

"Now, this document, beyond all question, was not a document which was intended to transfer or did transfer the property in these goods; because, if there is anything clear in the transaction, it is this, that at the time at which this document, whatever its effect, began to operate, Charlesworth was in possession of the goods under an arrangement by which he was to have, for certain purposes at least, a title to them. He did not get his title under that document, he got his title by virtue of the transaction, and the document never began to operate at a time at which he had not possession."

Every word of that applies here, and this case appears to me to be well within that decision. This document was not a bill of sale, and I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

DAVEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first point is whether this document is within the purview of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. In my opinion it is not. It has been held in this court, in Ex parte Hubbard (2), and affirmed by the House of Lords in Charlesworth v. Mills (1), that the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, does not apply to a case in which the property in goods passes and is accompanied with possession.

As to possession, it is only in consequence of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, that the question could arise between husband and wife as in this case. The plaintiff purchased from her husband furniture which at the time of her purchase was in use in their common household, and after the purchase the goods

A remained where they were. Did the possession of them pass to her? How does the case stand on principle? In LITTLETON'S TENURES, s. 701, it is said:

"Where two be in one house, or other tenements, and the one claimeth by one title and the other by another title, the law shall adjudge him in possession that hath right to have the possession of the same tenements."

B Following that is this passage in POLLOCK AND WRIGHT ON POSSESSION, at p. 24:

"Where possession in fact is undetermined, possession in law follows the right to possess."

Then in Jones v. Chapman (3) MAULE, J., said (2 Exch. at p. 821):

C "It seems to me that, as soon as a person is entitled to possession, and enters in assertion of that possession, or, which is exactly the same thing, any other person enters by command of that lawful owner so entitled to possession, the law immediately vests the actual possession in the person who has so entered. If there are two persons in a field, each asserting that the field is his, and each doing some act in the assertion of the right of possession, and if the question is, which of those two is in actual possession, I answer the person who has the title in actual possession, and the other person is a trespasser."

D It was argued that that applied only to real estate. But I can see no reason why the same principle should not be applied to personal chattels.

Then it was said that there was, in this case, no apparent change of possession, that the ostensible possession of the goods was the same as before the sale. The same point was raised in Charlesworth v. Mills (1), and LORD HERSCHELL said

E ([1892] A.C. at p. 242):

"The question whether it is a possession which excludes the apparent possession of the other party might arise under the [Bills of Sale] Act of 1878; but it is not of the slightest importance in the present case. Is it a possession as between the person giving it and the person taking it? When once it is admitted, as it was inevitably admitted by the learned counsel for the respondent, that it was a possession sufficient as between those two persons to constitute a good pledge, it seems to me that the case is at an end. I say "inevitably admitted," because how can it be disputed that as between the two persons to the transaction it would have been impossible for the person who had received an advance on giving this possession to say that he had not given the other person a possession of the goods which would entitle him to hold them as a security for the advance? And that is all that a pledge is."

F In the present case the question is, whether possession of the furniture passed from the husband to the wife. Under the circumstances, I draw the inference that they intended that the goods should become out and out the goods of the wife, just as other articles which she had and which were in her possession were hers. In other words, they intended that possession of the goods as well as property should pass to the wife. That intention, I think, was carried out, and she had afterwards the sole disposition of them. As the goods remained in the house where they were both living, her possession of the goods was quite as consistent with everything as her husband's possession. It is difficult to see what she could have done more than what was done, because she bought the goods with the intention of using them in the house as before the sale. If there had been a tradition, symbolical or actual, there would have been no doubt in the matter, but in my opinion no formal act was necessary to transfer the possession. In my opinion, therefore, such possession was given as took the case out of s. 8 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

I On the other point I agree with the judgments that have been delivered. WRIGHT, J., has found that this document was intended to be only a common receipt, and the words which the solicitor put in at the end of it were not part of the transaction of sale. The document, therefore, is not within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, because it has been decided that the definition of "bill of sale" in s. 4 only applies to such receipts as are intended to operate as "assurances," That was laid down by BOWEN, L.J., in North Central Wagon Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (4). I may also refer if necessary to the judgments in Woodgate v. Godfrey (5). I agree with the findings of WRIGHT, J., and upon those findings the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, does not apply here.

The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant to restrain him from using a machine which the plaintiff alleged was an infringement of his patent. M., the maker and patentee of the machine in dispute, which he had sold to the defendant, applied to be joined as a co-defendant on the ground that the defendant would not contest the action efficiently.

Held: the court had no jurisdiction under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11, to add M. as co-defendant for, though M.'s interest might be affected commercially by a judgment against the defendant, it would not be legally affected.

Montforts then applied by way of motion to the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine for an order that he should be added as a co-defendant to the action. The application was made under Ord. 16, r. 10, of the Palatine Court, which was the same as Ord. 16, r. 11, of the Rules of the Supreme Court. The Vice-Chancellor made the order asked for, and from this decision the plaintiff appealed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster, by which he has directed in an action in the Palatine Court that Montforts should be added as a defendant on his own application. The action is an ordinary action to restrain an alleged infringement of the plaintiff's patent by the defendant Marsden, by using a machine which was made abroad by Montforts, who says he has a patent for it in Germany. The order has been made under the rule of the Palatine Court which is identical with Ord. 16, r. 11, of the Rules of the High Court.

G The question at issue between the plaintiff and the defendant Marsden, as far as they two are alone concerned, can be worked out without anyone else being brought in to take part in the action. There may be a score of persons like Marsden using this particular machine, but there is no law or equity to oblige the plaintiff to sue all of them. Therefore it is clear that it cannot be said that the case comes within that part of the rule which provides that the court may order the names of any parties, whether plaintiffs or defendants, "who ought to have been joined," to be added. In no sense can it be said that Montforts ought to have been joined as a party to this action. But reliance is placed on the following words of the rule which provide for adding the names of parties ["whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter."] But what is the question involved in this action? The question, and the only question, is, whether what Marsden is doing is an infringement of the plaintiff's patent. In order properly to understand the rule we must look at the whole of it. It begins by saying, ["No cause or matter shall be defeated by reason of the misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties."] That is the key to the whole section. If the court cannot decide the question without the presence of other parties the cause is not to be defeated, but the parties are to be added so as to put the proper parties before the court.

In the Court of Chancery actions were common enough in which one person represented and acted on behalf of many, and if any one of the many could satisfy the court that the person appointed to represent them did not adequately represent the interests of the class, it was a reason for putting someone else in his place. It was said that the rule goes further, but can it be reasonably extended beyond this? Can it be said that the rule prevents the plaintiff from proceeding against the defendant without having to litigate with everybody who may be in any way affected, however indirectly, by the action? It appears to me that it does not. The counsel for the applicant grounded his argument on the allegation that Montforts' interest would be affected by the decision in this action. It is true that his interest may be affected commercially by a judgment against the defendant; but can it be said that it would be legally affected? Can we stretch the rule so far as to say that whenever a person would be incidentally affected by a judgment he may be added as a defendant? No case has been cited that goes so far as that; the nearest to the present case are Vavasour v. Krupp (1) and Apollinaris Co. v. Wilson (2). But in both those cases the proceedings affected the property of persons not before the court. I can understand the application of the rule where the property of a third party is affected. He may well say, "I am not to be deprived of my property in my absence." But this case does not come up to that. In my opinion the Vice-Chancellor has construed the rule too widely. The case does not come under the rule at all; it is not a question of discretion, but of jurisdiction, and I think the order must be discharged.

KAY, L.J.—I entirely concur in the judgment which has been delivered, but out of respect to the Vice-Chancellor I wish to add a few words as to the grounds on which I differ from him. He has extended the rule in question to a case which it was not intended to cover. The action is brought against Marsden personally, and any judgment which he may obtain will not affect Montforts directly, but only incidentally. But he says it will affect him because the machine was made under his patent, so that in the action against Marsden the value of Montforts' patent comes in question, and although the judgment in this action would not bind him and could not be pleaded in any action against him or anyone else except Marsden, yet it will frighten people from buying his machines, and it therefore will affect him, if not directly, yet indirectly and commercially, and therefore that he ought to be let in to defend the action. I know of no case which goes to that extent. The class of cases where the property of the third party was affected are on a different principle. The result on the construction contended for would be, that not only persons directly affected, and who would be bound by the judgment in the action, would be within the rule, but any person who might think he would be affected indirectly might insist upon being made a party; and not only so, but if it appeared to the judge that any person would be indirectly affected, it would be his duty of his own accord to make him a party. Take the case of an action for infringement of a trade mark: there may be a good many persons doing the same thing as the defendant; could it be intended that all of them should have a right to insist on being made parties? No doubt the judgment in the present case may indirectly affect Montforts' patent, but the answer to that is, that, whether it would affect it or not, this rule does not apply to such a case. Montforts says that the defendant will not contest the case properly, and will not conduct the defence so energetically as he would. But we cannot help that. With all deference to the Vice-Chancellor, I do not think the rule applies to this case.

CHALMERS v. CHALMERS

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Sir Francis Jeune, P.), December 21, 1892]

[Reported 68 L.T. 28; 1 R. 504]

B Variation of Settlement—"Settlement"—Absolute assignment of property by wife to husband during marriage.

Divorce—Maintenance of wife—Order to husband to secure to wife value of property assigned by her to him during marriage.

During the marriage a wife assigned to her husband absolutely certain property subject to mortgages. Subsequently, the wife obtained a decree dissolving the marriage, and she thereupon petitioned for variation of the assignment as a post-nuptial settlement, namely, for an order that the husband should re-assign the property to her. She also petitioned for maintenance.

C Held: the assignment was not a "settlement" within the meaning of s. 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 [now s. 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950], but on the petition for maintenance the court would order

D the husband to secure to the wife, as maintenance, the value of the property she had assigned to him subject to the outstanding mortgages thereon.

Notes. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, has been repealed. For s. 5 of that Act see now s. 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (29 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 412).

H Motion by the petitioner, Julia Chalmers, who had obtained a decree dissolving her marriage, for variation of an alleged post-nuptial settlement, or, in the alternative, for an allowance by way of permanent maintenance.

On Aug. 22, 1871, when living with her husband, the petitioner executed, in his favour, an absolute assignment of certain property, subject to mortgages. This assignment she now wished to have varied by an order on the respondent that he should re-assign the property to her, and she was willing to accept such re-assignment, subject to all valid charges thereon, instead of any allowance for maintenance. The registrar reported in favour of this proposition, in the event of the court being of opinion that the assignment was a "settlement" within the terms of s. 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859.

Bayford, Q.C. (Brook Little with him), for the petitioner.

Priestley for the respondent.

SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P.—I cannot hold the assignment by the wife of this property to be a "settlement" within the words of s. 5. A settlement means the settlement of property subsisting between husband and wife, and the Act gives power to alter or vary it when, and only when, the relation of husband and wife has ceased to subsist. The power to dispose of it absolutely does not seem to be the test. In this case, while, as I have said, I should have great difficulty in holding that this assignment by the wife was a "settlement," I feel no hesitation upon the alternative point; and, therefore, upon the second petition now before me, I order that the respondent secure to the petitioner, as maintenance, the value of the property in question, subject to the mortgages outstanding thereon.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.), May 21, 27, 28, July 22, 1892]

Corporation—Powers—Limitation—Prohibition of more extensive rights possessed by corporation as owner of property.

Where the legislature has expressly conferred on a corporation powers which the corporation, as the owner of property, could have exercised without any express authority the powers expressly given must be treated either as superfluous or as purposely inserted in order to define—i.e., to limit—the right conferred and as implying a prohibition against the exercise of the more extensive rights which the corporation might have by virtue of its ownership of property.

Corporation—Byelaw—Defined—Regulation made by corporation to bind, not only corporation, its officers and servants, but members of the public.

A byelaw made by a corporation regarding the use of its property is not an agreement between the corporation and those persons who wish to use the property. It is a law binding on all persons to whom it applies, whether they agree to be bound or not. All regulations made by a corporate body and intended to bind, not only themselves and their officers and servants, but members of the public who come within the sphere of their operation, may be properly called "byelaws" whether they be valid or invalid in point of law, for the term "byelaw" is not restricted to that which is valid in point of law.

Practice—Parties—Plaintiff—Locus standi—Trade protection association—Registration as company—No ownership of property.

An association, registered as a limited company and formed to protect the interests of its members, had no property of its own. The individual members owned the property which the association was designed to protect.

Held: the association had no locus standi to bring an action in its own name as agent for the members.

- F Appeal from a decision of A. L. SMITH, J., in an action for a declaration and injunction.

- The plaintiffs, the London Association of Shipowners and Brokers, Ltd., and the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., by their statement of claim, said that the second defendants, the London and St. Katharine Dock Co., were, under certain Acts of Parliament, the owners of certain docks, and that the
- G defendants, the London and India Docks Joint Committee, were at all material times the responsible managers of the defendants' undertaking; that the plaintiffs, the London Association of Shipowners and Brokers, Ltd., was a company incorporated under the Companies' Acts, 1862 to 1890, with the object, among others, of protecting shipping and maritime interests, especially in regard to the regulation, management, customs, and usages of the port of London, and of the
- H docks, warehouses, wharves, and Custom House therein; that the association and all the members thereof were largely interested in ships using the defendants' undertaking, in particular the plaintiffs, the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., being the owners of a large number of ships habitually using the defendants' undertaking. The plaintiffs alleged that in December, 1890, the defendants issued regulations, dated Jan. 1, 1891, with which owners of ships
- I using the defendants' undertaking were required to comply, and which applied to all vessels entering the docks of the defendants' undertaking after Feb. 1, 1891, and that those regulations had not been confirmed in manner prescribed by the statutes regulating the defendants' undertaking, and were invalid and void, but that the defendants still required shipowners using their docks to comply with such regulations, and insisted that they were binding upon such shipowners. The plaintiffs, accordingly, brought this action against the defendants, claiming (i) a declaration that the regulations were invalid until confirmed in the manner prescribed by the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847; and (ii) an injunction restraining the defendants until such confirmation from enforcing the regulations. On Feb. 20, 22, and 23, 1892, the action came on for trial with witnesses before A. L. SMITH, J., who gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed. A

July 22, 1892. The following judgments were read.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of A. L. SMITH, J., dismissing the plaintiffs' action with costs. The object of the action and of the appeal is to obtain a declaration to the effect that a new code of regulations made by the defendants, and dated Jan. 1, 1892, is invalid, and in excess of the defendants' statutory powers. The plaintiffs also seek to obtain an injunction to give effect to such declaration; but their counsel stated that they would be content with a declaration and liberty to apply, and that an injunction was a matter of comparatively small importance. The defendants maintain that their so-called regulations are not, and cannot fairly be taken to be, rules binding on anyone who does not agree to observe them. The defendants further contend that, even if the public have a right to complain of the regulations as made by the defendants in excess of their statutory powers, yet that the plaintiffs do not represent the public, and suffer no special damage, and are not entitled to maintain the action. Such being the general nature of the controversy, it becomes necessary to consider (i) The true nature of the regulations which have given rise to this controversy; (ii) The authority of the defendants to make them; (iii) Their legality or illegality; (iv) The position of the plaintiffs and their right to maintain an action in respect of them. C D E

(i) As to the nature of the regulations themselves. They are contained in a pamphlet. I will not stop to read that pamphlet; most of it is important. F The title page is this: "London and India Docks Joint Committee. Rates on Shipping." There follows "Using the [various] docks;" then

"The attention of captains of vessels is especially directed to the regulations regarding fires, lights, and smoking, as well as to the penalty for any breach thereof."

Then follow five pages headed "Dues and Rent on Shipping." Then come a number of paragraphs headed "Discharge of Vessels," and numbered 1 to 18; some of these impose rates and charges, others do not. These eighteen paragraphs are followed by some more paragraphs with various headings and imposing charges. Then come some regulations headed "Labour in Docks." Then come these words: G

"Under authority given by Acts of Parliament the schedule of rates is subject to revision from time to time." H

Last of all there are printed in large letters "By order, Dock House, 109, Leadenhall Street, E.C." It is impossible to read this new code, and especially the paragraphs 1 to 18, without coming to the conclusion that the defendants who issued the code intended its contents to be understood, and that those who would read them would understand them, or the bulk of them, at any rate, as rules or orders to be obeyed, and as imposing charges which must be paid apart from any agreement to that effect. No one reading the code would regard the regulations and charges simply as terms offered for acceptance by those who might use the docks to which the code relates. There is nothing optional in the wording of paragraph No. 1: "Shipowners will be required to comply with the following regulations, etc., etc.," and the same imperative tone runs through the whole. I am not now discussing the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the regulations or of the charges; their character in that respect does not affect I

A their authoritative tone. I cannot regard them as anything short of rules or orders and charges emanating from, and imposed by, the defendants, and made by them in the exercise of some authority claimed by them under their statutory powers.

(ii) I pass, therefore, to the consideration of the authority of the defendants to make such regulations and charges. The defendants, the London and St. Katharine Dock Co., are merely the owners of the docks. The regulations and charges are made and imposed by the defendants, the London and India Docks Joint Committee. This joint committee is a corporate body created by the London and St. Katharine, and East and West India Docks Act, 1888, for the purpose of working eight large docks in London as one undertaking: see the preamble and ss. 4, 9, and 10. The powers of the joint committee are enumerated in s. 31, and are shortly the same as those which were previously vested in the London and St. Katharine Dock Co. and the East and West India Dock Co. respectively. These dock companies were, and indeed continue to be, the owners of the docks alluded to, some of the docks belonging to one company and some to the other. The dock which is more particularly in question in this action is the Royal Albert Dock, belonging to the London and St. Katharine Dock Co. Whatever regulations this company could have made for the use of that dock can now be made by the joint committee. Section 57 authorises the committee to make the same tonnage rates on vessels using the docks of the London and St. Katharine Dock Co. as the East and West India Dock Co. were empowered by s. 25 of their Act of 1882 to make.

The power of the defendants to make regulations for the use of the Royal Albert Dock and of the other docks belonging to the London and St. Katharine Dock Co. must be sought for in that company's special Act of 1864 (27 & 28 Vict., c. clxxviii), and in the General Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, which is incorporated in it. Under these two Acts the public have certain rights to use the docks, including the wharfs, quays, and warehouses, and the company are empowered to make byelaws and regulations and charges for their use. The rights of the public to use the docks, including the wharfs, quays, and warehouses, all of which, it must be borne in mind, belong to the company, are conferred by s. 2 and 33 of the general Act. Section 2 is the definition clause, and by it

“the expression ‘the harbour, dock, or pier’ shall mean the harbour, dock, or pier, and the works connected therewith by the special Act authorised to be constructed.”

G These works, I apprehend, include the quays, wharfs, and warehouses, all of which are constructed under the powers of the special Acts, and are essential to the use of the harbours, docks, and piers more especially mentioned in them. This was certainly the case with the warehouses constructed under the powers of the Victoria (London) Docks Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict., c. cxxxi), s. 28, which is set out in Sched. 4 to the special Act of 1864 (p. 2396 of the Queen's printers' copy). Moreover, the expressions “the London Docks,” “the St. Katharine Docks,” and the “Victoria Docks,” are expressly declared by s. 5 of the special Act of 1864 to mean and to include warehouses, wharfs, and quays; and it is very difficult to read that Act and the general Act together without attributing the same meaning to the word “dock” which constantly occurs in both.

I Section 33 of the general Act of 1847 entitles the public to use the harbour, dock, and pier as defined in s. 2 for shipping and unshipping goods and embarking and landing passengers; but this right of user is subject to the payment of the rates made payable by the general and special Acts, and is subject to the other provisions thereof, i.e., of both Acts. These other provisions include those specially relating to warehouses as well as those relating to byelaws and regulations, all of which will be examined presently. The special Act is silent as regards the rights of the public, except that by certain former Acts referred to in Sched. 4, and not repealed, the docks of the company are to be deemed to be situate in and part of the port of London, and that the rights and privileges which belong to that port extend to these docks; and the company's quays and wharfs are made legal quays and wharfs within the same port: see 9 Geo. 4, c. cxvi, ss. 112, 113, p. 2368; 6 Geo. 4, c. cv, ss. 92, 93, p. 2389; 16 & 17 Vict., c. cxxx, s. 49, p. 2397. A

The powers of the company to regulate the use of the docks, quays, and warehouses and to make charges for their use depend partly on the fact that the company is the owner of them and partly on the fact that the company's rights as owner are largely governed by special provisions rendered necessary for the protection of the public. Subject, however, to the restrictions expressly or impliedly imposed by statute, the company can exercise the ordinary rights which are incidental to the ownership of their docks, quays, and warehouses. As owner the company could make any regulations it might think proper for the use of its property. It could charge what it liked, and could shut its docks altogether if people would not comply with its demands. These powers, however, are not unchecked by statute. The legislature has expressly conferred upon the company many powers which the company, as the owner of property, could have exercised without any express statutory authority. Whenever this is the case, the powers expressly given must be treated either as superfluous or as purposely inserted in order to define—i.e., limit—the right conferred, and as implying a prohibition against the exercise of the more extensive rights which the company might have by virtue of its ownership of property. That the latter is the true mode of regarding statutory powers conferred on bodies created for public purposes, and authorised to acquire land for such purposes, cannot, I think, admit of any doubt. B

Bearing this observation in mind, let us see what powers are expressly conferred upon the company by statute. It will be found necessary to distinguish the power of imposing rates and charges from the power to make regulations or byelaws, and it will be convenient to consider the last power first. The general Act of 1847 expressly enables the company to lease for not more than three years, or grant the use or occupation of its warehouses, buildings, wharves, yards, cranes, machines, and other conveniences, on such terms as shall be agreed upon between the company and the persons taking the same (s. 23). This section is a clear instance, not of an enabling, but of a restrictive, clause. It is necessary, not to enable the company to make agreements with respect to the use of its own property, but to enable it to derogate from the rights which the public would otherwise have over that property. Section 23 limits the rights which the public could otherwise claim under s. 33, and enables the company to set apart for the exclusive use of an individual part of the property which the public would otherwise have a right to use. The power conferred by s. 23 cannot, however, be properly used to force any person to come to terms with the company for the use of any property which the public has a right to use on terms applicable to all persons alike. The clauses relating to the powers of the harbour master, and various offences by persons using the docks, etc., may be passed over as irrelevant to the present inquiry. Section 83 enables the company to make byelaws under its common seal for a great variety of purposes, which may be summarised as for the use of its docks and property. Penalties may or may not be imposed for infringement of the byelaws (s. 84), but no byelaws (except such as relate solely to the company or their officers or servants) have effect unless confirmed as required by s. 85. Moreover, notices have to be given before they are confirmed (ss. 86, 87), and when confirmed they have to be published as directed by the Act (s. 88). When duly made, confirmed, and published, the byelaws become binding on all parties (s. 89), and they can only be altered by other byelaws similarly made and confirmed. C

This power of making byelaws is something very different from the power which every owner of property has of making agreements with those persons who may desire to use it. A byelaw is not an agreement, but a law binding on all persons to whom it applies, whether they agree to be bound by it or not. All regulations D

A made by a corporate body, and intended to bind, not only themselves and their officers and servants, but members of the public who come within the sphere of their operation, may be properly called "byelaws," whether they be valid or invalid in point of law, for the term "byelaw" is not restricted to that which is valid in point of law. The exception in ss. 83 and 85 warrants the use of the word byelaw in the sense of a regulation binding only on the company, its officers and servants; but these same sections show that a byelaw in this more limited sense can be made and unmade at the will of the company, and requires no confirmation and publication. This double use of the word byelaw is apt to create confusion, and is, perhaps, to be accounted for by a desire to make use of one term for all regulations for a breach of which penalties may be imposed under s. 84. The company's special Act of 1864 (27 & 28 Vict., c. clxxviii) also contains a power to make byelaws (see s. 113). This is a more detailed power than that conferred by the general Act, and relates not only to the use of the docks, but also to the management and conduct of the business and affairs of the company, to the management of its warehouses, and various other matters for which, however, fresh power was hardly necessary, considering that the general Act was incorporated in the special Act. The special Act is silent as to the mode of making byelaws; they must therefore be made as directed by the general Act.

B Section 99 of the special Act directs the company, in accordance with and subject to its regulations in that behalf, to afford to merchants and others entitled to or having charge of any goods deposited in or upon any of the warehouses, sheds, wharfs, quays, or premises of the company proper, and sufficient access to the goods so deposited. The use of the word regulations in this section is perplexing. The byelaw section enables the company to make byelaws to the same effect as any regulations which can be made under this section, and I am by no means clear that by regulations in s. 99 are meant anything different from byelaws. The object of the section is not to enable the company to make regulations, but to compel the company to afford proper access to goods on their premises subject to proper regulations. The power to make such regulations must be sought for elsewhere. They must necessarily affect merchants and other persons besides the officers and servants of the company, and I can find no power to make regulations as distinguished from byelaws for the conduct of any persons other than the company, its officers and servants. Even regulations for the conduct of the company's officers and servants are called "byelaws" by the general Act, although they do not require confirmation or publication. Assuming, however, that s. 99 refers to some regulations which are not byelaws, they are confined by this section to the access to goods on the property of the company. By no legitimate process of construction or reference can s. 29 be stretched so far as to justify such rules and regulations as are in controversy in this action.

C The only remaining sections to which it is necessary to allude are those which relate to the power of levying tonnage and other rates on ships and goods. The general Act of 1847 does not contain any clause authorising the imposition of rates, but it contains several (viz., ss. 25 to 50) relating to the payment and collection of such as may be authorised by special Acts. The most important of these are ss. 30, 46, and 47. Section 30 enables companies to vary their rates provided they do not exceed the maximum sums mentioned in the special Acts, and provided all persons are charged alike; s. 46 provides for the settlement of disputes by justices; s. 47 provides for the publication of tables of the rates payable. The authority for imposing tonnage rates on ships entering the docks of the defendants is conferred by s. 27 of the special Act of 1888 (51 & 52 Vict., c. clxiii), which apparently replaces s. 132 of the special Act of 1864. The section relating to rates on goods is s. 134 of the last-mentioned Act; and this section authorises the company to levy rates on goods brought into, or landed or deposited within, or delivered or shipped from the docks and works for and in respect of their wharfage, unshipping, landing, re-landing, piling, housing, weighing, cooping, sampling, unpling, unhousing, watching, shipping, loading, and delivering, and generally in respect of any work to be performed in respect of the goods. Tables of these rates are to be made and printed and published as directed by the section. The tonnage rates on ships, and the import and export rates on goods, must not exceed the maximum amounts fixed by statute (see in addition the sections in the general Act of 1847, already noticed, s. 57 of the Act of 1888, and the provision in s. 134 of the Act of 1864); but the only limit to the other rates is that they must be reasonable (see s. 134 of the Act of 1864). It is to be observed that the power to make rates is distinct from and in addition to the power to make byelaws. Byelaws are not necessary for the imposition of rates, nor, indeed, do the byelaw sections authorise their imposition. The rates may be varied from time to time.

(iii) Having ascertained the powers of the joint committee, it remains to consider the legality or illegality of the provisions of the new code. First, I will take the rates and charges by themselves. The tonnage and other rates on ships are not disputed, and may be passed over. The rates mentioned in regs. 2 and 3 are not rates on goods within the meaning of s. 134 of the Act of 1864; nor can they be imposed by authority under s. 23 of the general Act of 1847, which relates to letting on terms to be agreed upon. The rates in 2 and 3 can only be defended, if at all, on grounds which will be further considered presently. The rate of 1s. 6d. per ton in reg. 10 is not authorised by s. 134 of the Act of 1864, for that section applies to rates payable to the dock company, and not to rates payable by it. The rates mentioned in regs. 13, 14, 15, 17, and 18, are not quarrelled with, although other parts of some of these regulations are. The regulations contained in the code are not binding as orders, rules, regulations, or laws. Imperative in form, they bind no one to obedience. They are not, and do not purport to be, byelaws; but no other orders, rules, or regulations made by the defendants can be binding simply as orders, rules, or regulations. They may, of course, be expressly or impliedly assented to, and so become binding by agreement. But an agreement is one thing; a regulation which has to be obeyed whether assented to or not is quite another thing, and these regulations can only be regarded as binding on those persons who in fact assent to them and agree to conform to them. It is said that there never have been any byelaws for the regulation of the docks. That is, however, to be accounted for by the fact that until the new code came into force the dock authorities themselves did all the work in the docks except loading outgoing ships. Under those circumstances no one cared to test the legality of the regulations. When, however, the practice was changed and the shipowners unloaded their own ships, and when the dock authorities sought to force them to do a great deal more than discharge their own cargoes, regulations which previously had produced no inconvenience became galling, and their legality was naturally questioned, and, being questioned, must be decided.

The great dispute turns on reg. 2, and the terms on which shipowners are entitled to have berths appropriated to their ships. I can find nothing in the statutes relating to these docks which entitles any shipowner to demand that a particular berth shall be kept for him; nor is there anything which entitles the dock company to make any special charge for such a convenience if granted. Under these circumstances, if the convenience has been enjoyed and a dispute arises about the terms of payment, a court of law must decide in each particular case—first, whether the shipowner who has had a berth kept for him has agreed to pay the rate demanded; and, secondly, if not, then what is a reasonable price for the accommodation which he has enjoyed. This is the view contended for by the defendants, and so far they are right. For similar reasons the defendants are right as to all those regulations which refer to special accommodation and facilities, viz., 4, 13, 14, 15, 17, 18. The real truth is, that shipowners who want special accommodation cannot force the defendants to give it them, even on payment of reasonable compensation. Special accommodation must be made the subject of special agreement. Regulation 2 contains the pecuniary terms

A on which the defendants are willing to give the accommodation; the other terms are in the other regulations. If the plaintiffs will not assent to those terms the defendants can refuse the special accommodation. The effect of this no doubt may be to drive the plaintiffs to other docks in other ports where more favourable terms can be made, if any such can be found. The only safeguard against this is the defendants' own view of their own interests.

B Regulation 3 is also quarrelled with, but it is not open to the remarks made on reg. 2, for reg. 3 does not apply to cases in which exceptional facilities are afforded. The first part of reg. 3 is unobjectionable; it is a mere notice that the dock master's orders as to berths must be obeyed. The second part, however, is not warranted by any statutory enactment. It is an attempt by the defendants to force shipowners to pay for what they do not want, and to compel them to

C hire quay and shed space in order to do work formerly done by the dock company, and which the shipowners object to have forced on them. This must be taken in conjunction with regs. 9 and 10, which purport to bind all shipowners, and not only those who desire special accommodation. For reasons already given, I am of opinion that these regulations can only be made binding by being passed and confirmed as byelaws, although, of course, those persons

D who choose to agree to them may do so, and may thus become bound by them. The same remark applies to all the other regulations not confined to special accommodation and special facilities which the dock company are not bound to afford, i.e., to all the regulations except Nos. 2, 4, 13, 14, 15, 17, and 18, which do relate only to special accommodation and facilities. The general Act of 1847 contains a s. 22 binding the company to supply cranes and labourers

E to work them; but reg. 14 applies to specially large cranes, and not to such as the company is bound to supply under the section to which I have referred.

(iv) I come now to the last head, viz., the position of the plaintiffs and their right to maintain this action. The London Association of Shipowners and Brokers, Ltd., is a trade protection society. It has no ships or goods of its own. Its members have, and it really sues on their behalf; but the society itself is only

F their agent, and this is not a case in which an agent can sue in his own name. This society, therefore, has no locus standi. This objection is purely technical, for any one of the members of the society can sue on behalf of himself and other shipowners in the same interest, and an action so constituted would be free from objection in point of form. Liberty to amend might probably have been obtained if applied for in time. It is too late, however, now to amend in this

G respect. The other plaintiffs are the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., an incorporated company owning a large fleet of steamers using the defendants' docks. The Peninsular and Oriental Co., if aggrieved by the defendants' regulations, has a clear locus standi as plaintiff in an action brought to have its grievances redressed. At the same time, the Peninsular and Oriental Co. is not like the Attorney-General, and is not entitled to sue on behalf of the public for the

H purpose of preventing the defendants from exceeding their statutory powers irrespective of any particular injury to any particular individual. The Peninsular and Oriental Co. must show that it is itself aggrieved before it is entitled to any declaration or relief in an action brought by itself. Had this action been an information by the Attorney-General there would be no difficulty in declaring the regulations complained of not to be binding on the public and in granting

I an injunction to restrain the joint committee from enforcing them, for I regard the new code as an imposition on the public. The difficulty in the way of the Peninsular and Oriental Co. maintaining this action is as follows. The Peninsular and Oriental Co. always, in fact, requires berths to be appropriated to its ships, and the Peninsular and Oriental Co. is not concerned with and is not affected by regulations which relate to the owners of ships not having fixed discharging berths. As regards appropriated berths, the terms on which they can be had in future must be settled by agreement, and the company has nothing to complain of in point of law. And as to the past, the company must pay either the sum demanded, or a reasonable sum as may be determined in one or more actions brought for determining that particular question in the case of each ship to which a discharging berth has in fact been appropriated. On these grounds it is contended that no right of the Peninsular and Oriental Co. has been infringed, and that this action is not maintainable by the Peninsular and Oriental Co. The only answer to this contention is as follows. It is true that the Peninsular and Oriental Co. always has required berths to be appropriated to its ships, and will in future find it very inconvenient not to have such berths; but the company is entitled to have unappropriated berths unfettered by illegal restrictions, and is entitled to exercise its option to have such berths or to have appropriated berths on terms which may be agreed upon. The joint committee has deprived the company of its rights in this respect, and offers the company an alternative which the joint committee has no right to insist upon, and consequently the Peninsular and Oriental Co. is aggrieved by the alternative presented to it, because, if it could have unappropriated berths subject only to proper byelaws, it might prefer them, with all their inconveniences, to appropriated berths on the terms insisted on by the joint committee. This argument would, in my opinion, be a sufficient answer to the technical objection that the Peninsular and Oriental Co. has no sufficient interest in the suit if the Peninsular and Oriental Co. did in truth want unappropriated berths, but it does not. The company is not claiming the option suggested, and does not care to have it. The Peninsular and Oriental Co. claims appropriated berths on terms which the joint committee will not concede. The Peninsular and Oriental Co. has, in fact, failed to establish its alleged rights, and the order appealed from must, therefore, stand. But the joint committee has rendered it necessary, or, if not necessary, at least expedient, that the rights of the Peninsular and Oriental Co., on the one side, and those of the joint committee, on the other, should be ascertained and declared. This can be done under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 5 [which provides that no proceeding shall be open to objection on the ground that a merely declaratory judgment or order is sought thereby], and under the peculiar circumstances of this case, and having regard to the contentions raised on both sides, the proper order on the appeal will be to declare that the regulations of the London and India Docks Joint Committee, contained in the printed exhibit H. W. W. 3, and therein numbered 1 to 18, and also the regulations therein contained, and headed "Labour in the Docks," not having been made and confirmed as byelaws, are not binding on the plaintiffs, the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., save so far, if at all, as the said company may have agreed or may agree to be bound by the same, and to declare that the said company is not entitled to have berths appropriated to its ships, nor to have other special accommodation or conveniences except upon such terms as may be agreed upon between the company and the aforesaid joint committee. With this declaration the appeal must be dismissed, but without costs.

Will—Apportionment—Tenant for life and remainderman—Effect of trust for conversion with power to postpone such conversion—Distinct gift of income pending conversion—Tenant for life entitled to whole income from investments unconverted—Exclusion of rule in Howe v. Dartmouth.

By his will a testator gave his residuary personal estate and effects to trustees upon trust to convert the same and invest the proceeds of sale as therein mentioned, with power to retain any securities existing at the time of his death during such period as they should think fit, and continued as follows: "I declare that my trustees shall stand possessed of the stocks, funds, shares, and securities for the time being constituting or representing the residuary personal estate and effects hereinbefore bequeathed and the income thereof," in trust to pay the income to certain tenants for life with remainders over. At the time of the testator's death part of his personal estate consisted of American railway bonds repayable at par at a fixed date, standing at a considerable premium in the market, and bearing interest at 6 per cent. The trustees exercised their discretion in retaining these bonds unconverted. On a summons, asking, among other things, how the income therefrom ought to be applied,

Held: on the true construction of the will there was a distinct gift of the income of whatever investments the trustees should hold for the time being, including the income of securities which in their discretion they retained, and, therefore, the tenants for life were entitled to the whole of the income from the bonds.

Adjourned Summons to determine whether life tenants under the will of George Wood were entitled to the whole of the income produced by bonds retained by the trustees in the exercise of their discretion, or whether they were merely entitled to interest at 4 per cent. on the capitalised value of the bonds. A

By his will, made May 29, 1886, George Wood, after appointing Thomas Travers Wood, William Edward Davidson, and Richard Macaulay Thomas executors and trustees of his will, and after making certain specific bequests, bequeathed all his moneys and securities for money, shares in public companies or in ships, and all other his personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever not thereinbefore specifically bequeathed, unto his said trustees, upon trust that they should receive, collect, and get in all the said residuary personal estate and effects thereinbefore bequeathed, and should at such time or times, and in such manner as they should think fit, sell, dispose of, and convert into money such part thereof as should not consist of money or of some or one of the stocks, funds, and securities thereinafter authorised as investments, or which they should think proper to retain. C
And he declared that, notwithstanding anything thereinbefore contained, it should be lawful for his said trustees in their absolute discretion to retain any securities or property which should belong to him at his decease, and in the state of investment or security in which the same should then be, for such period or periods as they should think fit, without being answerable for any loss which might be occasioned thereby. D

He further declared that his trustees should out of the moneys which should arise from the sale, disposition, and conversion thereinbefore directed, and the moneys which should belong to him at his decease, in the first place pay off all his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and should lay out and invest the residue in or upon any of the public stocks or funds, or Government securities of the United Kingdom or the Empire of India, or of any British colony or dependency, or upon real securities in England or Wales, but not elsewhere, or in or upon the mortgages, bonds, debentures, or debenture guaranteed, or preference stock or shares of any corporation, company, or public body in the United Kingdom, with power from time to time at the discretion of his trustees to vary such investments and also the investments of any stocks, funds, shares, or securities which should belong to him at his decease, and be retained unconverted into or for others of any nature thereby authorised. And he declared that his trustees should stand possessed of the stocks, funds, shares, and securities for the time being, constituting or representing the residuary personal estate and effects thereinbefore bequeathed and of the income thereof, upon trust to divide the said stocks, funds, shares, and securities into six equal parts or shares, and to pay the income of such parts or shares to certain persons for life as therein mentioned, and subject thereto he directed his trustees to stand possessed of all the stocks, funds, shares, and securities constituting or representing the residuary estate and effects thereinbefore bequeathed upon trust for his nephews and nieces in equal shares per capita. E
G

The testator died on Sept. 4, 1890. At the time of his death the testator possessed certain American railway bonds, redeemable at par at a fixed date, which were then, and at the date of the summons, at a premium in the market and bore interest at 6 per cent. The trustees had exercised their discretion in retaining these bonds unconverted. This was a summons taken out by two of the trustees of the will, asking among other things whether the tenants for life were entitled to receive the income of the bonds, or as the remaindermen claimed only 4 per cent. on their capitalised value in accordance with Brown v. Gellatly (3). H

Upjohn for two tenants for life.

Christopher James for defendants in the same interest.

George Henderson for tenants for life in remainder.

Ashworth James for the remaindermen.

- A KEKEWICH, J. I am not prepared to hold that where there is direction for conversion of personal estate, followed by a power of retention of existing securities in the absolute discretion of the trustees, and then there are trusts for tenants for life and afterwards for remaindermen, that the power of retention necessarily gives the tenant for life the enjoyment in specie of the securities retained by the trustees in the exercise of their discretion. I believe that to so hold would be
- B against the law as laid down in many cases and many textbooks. It would be against the practice of the conveyancers, who, I believe, have invariably provided for the rents and profits of property given in trust for sale being paid to the tenant for life where that was intended, and I think that no such doctrine receives any support from the decision of NORTH, J., in Re Sheldon, Nixon v. Sheldon (1), or of LORD CAIRNS in Brown v. Gellatly (3). I do not think either NORTH, J., or LORD
- C CAIRNS intended to decide or did decide any abstract doctrine of the kind.

- But I have no doubt that one looks out with an expectant eye for a direction that the tenant for life shall receive the income when one sees an express direction to the trustees to retain securities and any indication of the testator's intention that they shall retain indefinitely for so long as they may think fit. On the other
- D hand, I do not think that any judge has intended to hold that it is inconsistent with a settlement on certain persons for life and afterwards to others in remainder to hold that the income may, by reasonably plain words, be given in specie, and I do not think Porter v. Baddeley (4) really has any application to a case like the present, because there there was no trust for conversion, and the remarks of the Vice-Chancellor dealt with the facts in the absence of the trust for conversion, and referred to investment in terminable annuities, securities of a wasting character
- E coming within the rule which is known as the rule in Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth (5) and other rules applicable to the administration of personal estate.

- In this particular instance it seems to me that, now that I have had the advantage of hearing the authorities cited and the arguments on the construction of the will, that this case is an example of the cases to which Re Sheldon, Nixon v. Sheldon (1), and also Green v. Britten (2), to which I called the attention of
- F counsel for two tenants for life as being conveniently compared with it, belong. There TURNER, L.J., came to the conclusion from the words of the particular will, and I think I must consider that NORTH, J., in Re Sheldon, Nixon v. Sheldon (1) also came to the conclusion on the words of the particular will, no doubt looking, as I have ventured to say, with an expectant eye for the direction, and finding it without much difficulty.

- G I have no difficulty in finding it here. The testator directs his trustees to convert everything, a direction as absolute as it is possible to conceive, and then he gives an equally absolute discretion to his trustees to retain securities. The argument of counsel for two tenants for life is, that the securities which are retained come within the authorised securities, and that view is countenanced and supported by the language of LORD CAIRNS in Brown v. Gellatly (3). But I do not think that
- H that will carry you far enough; I think you must find a direction that the tenant for life shall enjoy in specie. The mere fact that it is authorised is not, standing alone, sufficient. But what the testator does here is this: having directed conversion, having directed payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and investment, and having also sanctioned retention at the discretion of the trustees he says,

- I "I declare that my trustees shall stand possessed of the stocks, funds, shares, and securities for the time being constituting or representing the residuary personal estate and effects hereinbefore bequeathed, and of the income thereof."

Of what are they to stand possessed? Of the stocks, funds, shares, and securities not only which they have converted, but surely also of those which they retain. Otherwise the retained securities are not dealt with at all. There seems to me to be no alternative. Either he here is declaring trusts of the stocks, funds, shares, and securities which for the time being are retained and which, therefore, for the time being, constitute or represent a portion of the personal estate, or, if they are not, there is no gift here of those retained securities at all. It seems to me here in this particular instance, when one comes to look into it, that it is the test of good drafting; it bears that test surely and well, and there is a distinct gift of the income of what the trustees hold for the time being, including that which in their discretion they retain. [COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, A. L. Smith and Davey, L.JJ.), November 29, 1893] D

[Reported 70 L.T. 200]

Divorce—Conduct conducing—Husband's petition for divorce on ground of wife's adultery—Husband's flirtations with other women.

If a wife, in answer to her husband's petition for divorce on the ground of her adultery, pleads flirtations by the husband with other women as conduct conducing to her adultery, the court will not strike out the pleading if the evidence which may be given in support could justify a judge in declining to grant relief. E

Where a wife alleged that during a period of five years her husband had paid marked attention to an unmarried woman; that she (the wife) had remonstrated with him, but that he had told her he could not give up his intimacy with this woman; that he had invited her to his house and corresponded with her notwithstanding the wife's repeated objections and remonstrances; that he had made presents to her and had absented himself from the wife's society in order to enjoy the society of this woman; and that he had frequently told his wife that he had been fascinated by this woman and would have run away with her if she had consented. The wife further alleged that the husband had also paid marked attention to another woman, had refused to give up his intimacy with her notwithstanding the wife's objections and remonstrances, and had been guilty of acts of undue familiarity, putting his arm round this woman's waist and allowing her to sit on his knee. F

Held: these allegations ought not to be struck out. G

C Interlocutory Appeal by the husband, the petitioner, from the decision of the President (SIR FRANCIS JEUNE) by which he allowed an appeal by the wife from an order of the registrar who had ordered that certain paragraphs of her defence should be struck out.

The husband petitioned for a divorce on the grounds of adultery. The wife denied the adultery charged against her, alleged condonation of the adultery (if any), and further pleaded, in addition to several counter-charges of adultery which she made against her husband,

D “3. That in and since the year 1887 the petitioner has paid marked attention to an unmarried lady with whom the petitioner and the respondent were acquainted, and when the respondent has remonstrated with him, he has told her that he would not and could not give up his intimacy with the said lady, and he has invited the said lady to his house and corresponded with her, notwithstanding the respondent’s repeated objections and remonstrances, and has made her presents, and that he has absented himself from the respondent’s society in order to enjoy the society of the said lady, and he frequently told the respondent that he has been fascinated by the said lady, and that he would have run away with her if she had consented.

E 4. That in and since the year 1890 the petitioner has paid marked attention to another lady, and has refused to give up his intimacy with her, notwithstanding the respondent’s objections and remonstrances, and that he has been guilty of acts of undue familiarity with the said lady.

F 5. That the petitioner, by his wilful neglect and misconduct, as set forth in paragraphs 3 and 4 of this answer, has condoned to the adultery (if any) of the respondent.”

Particulars of paras. 3 and 4 respectively were given, as follows :

G “The name of the unmarried lady was Miss A., and the flirtation extended from the year 1887 to the filing of the petition.

H The name of the unmarried lady was Miss B., and the flirtation extended from Nov. 12, 1892, to the filing of the petition, and the act of familiarity spoken to consisted of the petitioner putting his arm round her waist, and she sitting on his knee, at . . . in the month of December, 1892, and his arm round her waist on Jan. 2.”

The registrar struck out the paragraphs, but, upon appeal to the judge in chambers, they were ordered to be restored. On Nov. 13, 1893, the petitioner moved before the President by way of appeal from the order made in chambers, and the President dismissed the appeal. From this decision the petitioner appealed.

I Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., and Kisch for the petitioner.
Lockwood, Q.C., and Searle for the respondent.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an application to strike out certain paragraphs from a wife’s defence, and from the particulars given at the instigation or request of the husband, and the question is whether we can go, or ought to go to the length of ordering the passages to be summarily struck out. The question is a curious one, because s. 31 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, not only states certain grounds of defence to petitions for divorce, but it states that, although there may be no defence, circumstances may exist which, in the discretion of the judge who tries the case, may induce him not to grant a divorce. Therefore, we have not to consider ordinary pleadings with which we are all familiar, both at common law and equity, pleading facts which do not admit questions of degree or discretion; but we have to consider a case in which degree is everything, and in which the discretion turns upon the degree, and we are asked to strike out passages which state in a concise form that which the wife alleges against her husband. In proof of these very concise statements evidence may be given clothing the skeleton with flesh and blood, and produce a picture which may justify a judge in declining to grant relief. If that is so, it is impossible to say that we ought to strike them out. To do that now would be, to my mind, to adjudicate the case upon a wrong standard. It would be to adjudicate upon a question of degree, not upon the facts proved, but upon the short concise statement of them. I think it would be wrong; and without expressing any further opinion upon the case I think that the view of the learned President was right, who said in effect: "I shall not strike these paragraphs out. Let me see the picture complete, then I will exercise my discretion." I think that was quite right.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—As to these three paragraphs in this defence, if we could see that in no conceivable view they could serve any purpose, then I should agree they ought to be struck out. But I have read and re-read the paragraphs, and I cannot bring myself to that conclusion.

I agree with the law stated by senior counsel for the petitioner and with the authorities he produced, beginning with Cunnington v. Cunningham and Noble (1), and finishing up with St. Paul v. St. Paul and Farquhar (2) before LORD PENZANCE to which I will call attention in a moment. I take it to be settled that wilful neglect which has conduced to the adultery is neglect towards the other party which has conduced to the adultery. That is the meaning of Cunnington v. Cunningham and Noble (1), which was a case in which a man involuntarily got ten years' penal servitude, which was said to have conduced to the adultery, but it was held that would not do.

Without referring to the intermediate cases, I will simply refer to the judgment of LORD PENZANCE in St. Paul v. St. Paul and Farquhar (2), in which case, in my judgment, he lays down the law very concisely (L.R. 1 P. & D. at p. 743):

"Further it is only fair to the wife herself to permit her to come to the court and say, 'Notwithstanding that I have sinned, my sins really have been brought about, or very much helped forward, by the carelessness, neglect, and indifference of my husband.' That is a matter which clearly ought to be taken into consideration in favour even of a guilty wife."

Further on he lays it down that wilful neglect or default must mean wilful neglect or default concurring to the adultery.

I ask myself on reading these paragraphs: "Is there no case which can be made of neglect by the husband of the wife which conduced or might have conduced to the adultery?" I cannot say "No." Junior counsel for the petitioner has tried to fritter it away, and talked as if this was only a flirtation, and that a statement made by a husband to a wife that he would run away with a lady is made in the nature of a joke. I do not read this paragraph in such light. It begins: "That in and since the year 1887," and when I add that to the particulars it must read, "In and since the year 1887 down to the date of the petition," which was Jan. 13, 1893, that is five or six years,

"the petitioner has paid marked attention to an unmarried lady with whom the petitioner and the respondent were acquainted, and when the respondent has remonstrated with him he has told her that he would not and could not give up his intimacy with the said lady, and he has invited the said lady to his house and corresponded with her, notwithstanding the respondent's repeated objections and remonstrances, and has made her presents, and that he has

A absented himself [I read that as meaning during that period] from the respondent's society in order to enjoy the society of the said lady; and he frequently told the respondent that he was fascinated by the said lady, and that he would have run away with her if she had consented."

B I ask myself, if all these facts are proved, and if this skeleton, as LINDLEY, L.J., called it, were filled up with flesh and blood, is it absolutely impossible that those facts could have conduced to the adultery? I do not say whether they might or not, but it seems to me it is a case which the respondent is entitled to make against the petitioner. It may come to nothing, for all I know, but it ought not to be struck out at this period of the inquiry.

SEALE-HAYNE v. JODRELL AND OTHERS

E [HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Herschell, Lord Macnaghten, Lord Field and Lord Hannen), May 5, 8, 1891]

[Reported [1891] A.C. 304; 61 L.J.Ch. 70; 65 L.T. 57]

Will—"Relatives"—Relatives by affinity—Illegitimate relatives.

Will—"Named persons"—Gift to persons previously "named"—Persons designated, but not by Christian or surname included.

F A testator by his will gave bequests to named persons described as his "cousins" and "nieces," some of the bequests being absolute and others being to these persons for life and after their deaths to their children. He directed his residuary estate "to be equally divided among such of my relatives hereinbefore named as by virtue of the trusts and provisions hereinbefore contained shall become entitled to a vested transmissible interest in any part of my property." Some of the persons described as "cousins" were the children of an illegitimate brother and sister of the testator's mother, and the persons described as his "nieces" were in fact his wife's nieces.

G Held: the words "relatives before named" included (i) relatives by affinity; (ii) illegitimate relatives; (iii) persons merely described as "the children" of legatees mentioned by name, even though not themselves named by their Christian and surnames.

Appeal by Charles Seale-Hayne from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD HALSBURY, L.C., LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.), reported 44 Ch.D. 590, reversing in part a decision of STIRLING, J., reported 61 L.T. 677.

The question arose upon the construction of the will of the late Sir E. Jodrell, Bart. By his will dated Mar. 23, 1868, the testator appointed his wife and two of his friends to be his executrix and executors, and bequeathed to each of his two acting executors (not reckoning his wife as one) a legacy of £1,000. By cl. 3 he made certain bequests in favour of his wife, and by cl. 4 he gave his plate, pictures, and articles of vertu to his executors and trustees upon trust to permit his wife to have the use of the same during her life, and after her death he directed the same to be sold, the proceeds to form part of his residuary estate, but the portraits of her and himself, instead of being sold, were to be given "to such one of my relatives as shall then be in possession of my family estates." Clauses 6 to 13 contained specific bequests. He bequeathed by cl. 6 to B

"my cousin Richard Jennings the marble bust of my grandfather . . . and at his demise I bequeath the same to the person or persons who shall then be or constitute his heir-at-law;" C and by cl. 12

"to my cousin the Rev. Charles P. P. Jodrell, another of my single gold chains to be selected by my executors." D

By cll. 14 and 15 he gave to his executors his general personal estate, and the proceeds of sale of any real or leasehold estate of which he might have power to dispose at his death (which he gave to his executors upon trust for sale) upon trust, after payment of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies for his wife during her life, and after her death he directed his trustees to sell and convert the same into money, and out of the proceeds to set apart and pay the several legacies or sums of money specified in the twenty following paragraphs of his will, with a direction to marshal such proceeds so that charitable legacies should be paid out of pure personalty. E

Then came the following bequests, viz.: a bequest to "such one or more of the children of my late cousin Major Edward Jodrell other than his eldest son" as should be living at the testator's wife's death and attain twenty-one; a bequest in favour of the children of "my cousin Mary Bishop" for life, and after her death for her children surviving her and his wife and attaining twenty-one; a bequest in favour of "my said cousin Richard Jennings," and his wife during their lives, and after the death of the survivor for their children surviving them and his wife, and attaining twenty-one; a bequest in favour of "my cousin Louisa Buller" for her life, and after her death for Charles Seale-Hayne if he should survive her and the testator's wife; a bequest in trust for "my niece Emily Higgins" if she should survive his wife and attain twenty-one; a bequest in favour of "my two nieces Mary Champagné and Blanche Champagné" if they should respectively survive his wife and attain twenty-one; a bequest upon trust for "my cousin Major George King" for life, and after his death for his children who should survive him and the testator's wife and attain twenty-one; a bequest upon trust for "my cousin Georgiana Forde" for life, and after her death for such of her children as should survive her and his wife and attain twenty-one; a bequest upon trust for "my cousin Emily MacDonell" for life, and after her death for such of her children as should survive her and his wife and attain twenty-one. Then followed bequests to a goddaughter of the testator, and to several charities, and then cl. 37 was as follows: F

"As to all the residue and remainder of my real and personal estate not hereby effectually disposed of, I direct the same to be equally divided among G

A such of my relatives hereinbefore named as by virtue of the trusts and provisions hereinbefore contained, shall become entitled to a vested transmissible interest in any part of my property, and as to such of them as are females for their separate use respectively, and without power of anticipation."

B By a first codicil, dated Mar. 11, 1871, the testator revoked the bequest by his will made in favour of his nieces Mary Champagné and Blanche Champagné, and directed that such bequest should form part of the residue disposed of by the 37th clause of his will.

C By a fifth codicil, dated July 26, 1882, the testator appointed the plaintiffs Alfred Jodrell and R. E. Jennings executors of his will. He gave Alfred Jodrell a legacy of £1,000, giving as his reason for not giving him more that he would be the next baronet and receive a large income under the will of the testator's father. He was the eldest son of the testator's cousin Major Edward Jodrell, living at the testator's death, an elder brother having died in March, 1882. He then revoked the bequest by his will made upon trust for his niece Emily Higgins, and directed that the sum bequeathed should

D "fall into and be applied as part of my residuary estate, and shall be invested accordingly, and the dividends and income arising from such investment shall be paid to my wife during her life."

Clause 10 of the codicil, after reciting the revocation by the first codicil of the bequest in favour of his nieces Mary and Blanche Champagné, and the revocation of the bequest upon trust for his niece Emily Higgins, proceeded as follows :

E "Now I hereby direct and declare it to be my intention that neither of my above-named three nieces shall be entitled to participate in the division of my residuary estate as directed by the 37th clause of my will, and I hereby expressly exclude them from coming under the provisions of such clause."

The testator's widow died on Mar. 1, 1888.

F On Mar. 13, 1888, the originating summons was issued, and on the 29th an order was made directing inquiries, and, among others, an inquiry what persons named in the first thirty-six clauses of the will were relatives of the testator.

G By his certificate, dated Mar. 15, 1889, the chief clerk found that Charles Seale-Hayne was a first cousin once removed of the testator, and that Louisa Buller died in 1879 in the lifetime of the testator; also that the testator's cousin Rev. Charles P. P. Jodrell died in 1875. He also found that Major George King, Georgiana Forde, and Emily MacDonell, referred to in the will as cousins by the testator, were not in fact legitimately related to the testator, but were the legitimate descendants of persons who, along with the testator's mother, were the natural children of one Caroline Morison. These three persons were all dead. The other persons named in the will as cousins of the testator were legally his cousins. The persons named as nieces were the nieces of his wife.

H The position may, therefore, be summarised as follows. Excluding the persons who merely received a life interest under the will on the ground that they did not receive a "vested transmissible interest," there were only five persons who in a broad sense might be described as relatives who were mentioned nominatim under the will, namely the Rev. Charles P. P. Jodrell, Charles Seale-Hayne, Emily Higgins, Mary Champagné and Blanche Champagné, all of whom were the legitimate relatives of the testator or his wife. Of these, the Rev. Charles P. P. Jodrell died in the testator's lifetime and before the fifth codicil was made, Mary Champagné and Blanche Champagné were excluded by the first codicil, and Emily Higgins by the fifth codicil, leaving only Charles Seal-Hayne, and it was argued that if the testator intended, when making the fifth codicil, to give the whole of the residue to him, it was inappropriate in cl. 10 of this codicil to refer to the "division" of his residuary estate.

I The summons was adjourned into court, and came before STIRLING, J., who held (61 L.T. 677) that "transmissible" meant "capable of transmission" after death, and, consequently, persons who took merely life interests under the will were excluded from participation in the residue; and "relatives hereinbefore named" meant "legitimate relatives hereinbefore mentioned nominatim, if not by all their names, by some at least," and, therefore, the whole of the residue went to Charles Seale-Hayne who was the only person who, under the existing circumstances, answered to the description of "relative" contained in the residuary gift.

There was no appeal from that part of the decision by which STIRLING, J., held that the persons merely taking a life interest were excluded. Several of the persons interested appealed against the remainder of the decision, and the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal, holding that under the gift to "relatives before named" persons were entitled to take even though they were relatives by affinity and not consanguinity and even though by illegitimate relationship and even though they were described merely as "the children" of legatees named in the will, and not themselves mentioned nominatim.

From this decision, Charles Seale-Hayne appealed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—Two questions arise upon the construction of the residuary clause of the will of the testator in this case, namely, what interpretation is to be put upon the word "relatives," and what is the meaning to be attributed to the expression "my relatives hereinbefore named."

I will deal with these questions in the order in which I have mentioned them. It is, of course, not open to dispute that the word "relatives" according to its natural interpretation, if there were nothing to show that another meaning was to be attributed to it, would not include those who were what may be termed natural blood relations, but whose parents or grandparents were not born in wedlock, and who, therefore, were not in the eye of the law related to the testator. But it is not disputed that the testator having in the provisions of his will, indicated whom he considers to be "relatives" in the sense in which he is speaking of relatives, or members of his family, you are entitled to look at those other provisions in order to interpret the word "relatives" as used in this part of his will.

In the previous part of the will the testator has spoken of persons who were not legitimately related to him, but as regards whom there existed this blood relationship, as his "cousins." He has indicated, therefore, clearly that in his view they were his relatives, that they were being so regarded by him at the time when he made his will; and obviously, of course, when having mentioned these cousins, he mentions their children, he was viewing them also in the light of relations, and it was in that light as expressly specified and designated by him that he was intending to give them benefit under his will. It appears to me, therefore, impossible to entertain any doubt in the present case, speaking for myself, that the testator here, when in the subsequent part of his will he speaks of his relatives and refers to them as relatives whom he has benefited under the provisions of his will, is including in that term of "relatives" those whom he has shown by the expressions to be found in other parts of his will that he was then regarding as relatives.

But then it is said that he has confined his bounty under this residuary clause to the "relatives hereinbefore named," that it is to say, according to the interpretation which your Lordships are asked to put upon the words hereinbefore mentioned by name. It cannot be denied that the word "named," although its primary signification may be "mentioned by name," is also used, and used in no unnatural sense as synonymous with "specified" or "mentioned;" and I do not think that there is any hard-and-fast rule to be laid down, that in constructing a will you are always to give to any particular word that is used what is called its primary meaning. A word which is used commonly in the English language in several senses must be interpreted according to that which, having regard to the context

A and the whole provisions of the document which you have to construe, appears to be the sense in which the testator has used it.

I confess that for my own part, reading the will alone without regard to the considerations derived from the codicil, the impression produced is, that the testator did not intend, by using the language "hereinbefore named," to confine the words "such of my relatives hereinbefore named," to those relatives of whom he B had mentioned the Christian name and the surname. It is not easy to give reasons for such an interpretation. It is difficult to say more than that that is the effect which the perusal of the words in this will produces upon one's mind. But what certainly weighs with me is this, that the testator, I think, in this residuary clause intended to lay stress, not on the word "named" in the words "hereinbefore named," but that what he intended to lay stress upon was this, that it was not C all the relatives who had been made the objects of his bounty in the earlier part of the will whom he intended to share in this residue, but only those relatives the objects of his bounty who should take a vested transmissible interest. I think that is what he is intending by the expressions which he is using in this residuary clause; and I do not think, as I have said before, that the emphasis was intended to be upon the "relatives hereinbefore named," but upon "such of my relatives D hereinbefore named as shall become entitled to a vested transmissible interest." It may be that the words "hereinbefore named" were inserted inasmuch as some of the persons benefited, whom he describes as related to him, were not, strictly speaking, relatives. It may be that the words "such of my relatives hereinbefore named" were intended to indicate that the persons whom he had spoken of as "relatives" in the earlier part of the will, though not strictly his relatives, were E persons who, if they complied with the conditions, were intended by him to take the benefit.

I think I should have arrived at that conclusion merely upon a perusal of the terms of the will. But when one comes to the fifth codicil and considers that the testator had then before him and under his consideration the residuary clause of this will, if he was drawing this distinction between persons described and persons F named, and if that distinction was one of the cardinal points of his will, and he must be taken to have had present to his mind who were the persons he had named; when he has them thus before him, and is minded to make it clear that certain persons, namely three of his nieces, were not to take benefits under this residuary clause, it is to me really inconceivable that if he had been using the words "relatives hereinbefore named" in the sense contended for he should have framed the G fifth codicil in the manner in which he has done, because, by cl. 10 of the fifth codicil he excludes those three persons from participating in the division of his residuary estate, as directed by cl. 37. At that time, if the contention of the appellant be well founded, there was only one person entitled under that residuary clause; there would, therefore, be no question of division at all, and the simple and natural course to have adopted, if the testator had so understood and intended H the provisions of the residuary clause, would have been this, merely to provide by a clause in this codicil that the residuary estate should go to this single individual, to whom alone it was then in his contemplation that it should go. It appears to me that that would have been a much more natural course to have taken, and one which it is difficult to understand his not taking rather than putting in this clause in the codicil.

I It appears to me, therefore, that if one takes such assistance as one gets from that circumstance, the inference to be derived from the execution of that codicil, it fortifies that which I own is the conclusion which I should probably otherwise have arrived at, that the true interpretation has been put upon this will by the court below, and, therefore, this appeal ought to be dismissed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I agree with your Lordships and the Court of Appeal, that this is a plain case. The testator's will certainly appears to have been drawn by a lawyer. But the expression which has given rise to the present argument is not a technical one; and the question, as it seems to me, is whether that expression is to be treated as an exercise in cryptography or to be understood in the sense which would I think be naturally attached to it by an educated person of common intelligence, not being either hypercritical or disposed to look for a hidden meaning in ordinary language. A

The testator directs the division of his residuary estate after his wife's death in the following terms: B

"Among such of my relatives hereinbefore named as by virtue of the trusts and provisions hereinbefore contained shall become entitled to a vested transmissible interest in any part of my property."

In the earlier part of the will the testator had made bequests to certain beneficiaries, named in his will and described as connected with him in certain degrees of relationship. To some he gave an absolute interest, to others a life interest only with remainder to such of their children as should attain twenty-one, and survive the immediate tenant for life as well as testator's widow. I cannot doubt that of these persons, including the children I have referred to, all who became entitled to a vested transmissible interest come under the description of "my relations hereinbefore named," and that whether they were or were not relatives in the eye of the law, and whether they were named in the earlier part of the will separately and individually, or named by reference to their parentage, being described as children of persons separately and individually named. To hold otherwise would, I think, be to defeat the obvious intention of the testator by over-refinement and straining after precision more apparent, perhaps, than real. C D

I think the matter is sufficiently clear on the face of the will, looking to the residuary clause and the scheme of distribution of part of the testator's estate which precedes it. But it is certainly satisfactory to find, when you come to the fifth codicil, that the testator himself, having regard to the state of his family at the time, must have attached the same meaning to his residuary gift which commends itself to your Lordships. E

LORD FIELD.—I am also of opinion that the judgment of the court below is correct, and ought to be affirmed. The question for your Lordships' consideration depends upon the true construction to be given to cl. 37 of the testator's will. The testator has, before arriving at that clause, made various bequests to different classes of persons. Some of them are to strangers, with whom we at present have nothing to do, and some of them are mere personal presents to persons whom he has described as his relations; and a third class of them are to the children of persons whom he has named as relations also. F G

The question to be decided is whom did the testator intend to benefit by cl. 37 of the will? The first words in the clause, seem to me, to have a very strong governing influence in the decision of this case, because the testator says: H

"As to all the residue and remainder of my real and personal estate not hereby effectually disposed of, I direct the same to be equally divided among such of my relatives hereinbefore named."

That will having been made in 1868, by the fifth codicil, which he executed in 1882, the testator again uses words pointing to the circumstance that the estate which he is disposing of is the subject of division. It, therefore, seems to me quite clear or reasonably clear that the testator was certainly benefiting more than one person by this residuary devise—otherwise no effect would be given to the words "equally divided" in the will or "division" in the codicil, which would be a violation of one of the principal rules of construction. Further, it appears that at the time of the making of the will there were, I think, five persons to whom there had been previous bequests, but by the time of the execution of the codicil those bequests had either been revoked or the persons benefited by them had died. The result of that, therefore, was that only one person, the appellant, was held entitled to the benefit of this residuary estate, which seems to me again contrary to the intention of the testator. I

A The estate, therefore, being one which had to be divided between more than one person, who were the persons whom the testator intended to benefit? He intended to benefit first of all such of the persons whom he had named before as were his relatives. Then comes the question: What persons had he named before as relatives? On that it seems to me reasonably clear that the word "relatives" there is not to be construed in the strict primary sense, because the testator himself has

B described persons who were not in that sense relations as being "relatives." I think, therefore, that the word "relatives" is not to be construed in the primary sense, and the secondary sense is the one in which, from the terms of the will itself, I consider the testator intended it to be used.

There comes a third question, which is as to the expression "relatives hereinbefore named." What relatives has he hereinbefore named? The testator has

C named a great many persons, some of them not being his relatives at all; some of them he has named as relatives, calling them by name; some as cousins; and some (the principal portion) as the children of cousins, or the children of nieces. As I have observed before, he gives the names of those persons in the will, and, therefore, I confess I cannot myself see the smallest doubt or difficulty (really there is none) in identifying them. Again, it seems to me, that the primary

D meaning of the word "named" here is not that in which the testator uses it, but that he uses it in the larger sense as including children, or descendants of those whom he has named.

LORD HANNEN.—It is clear that the testator in his will called persons who were not legitimately connected with him his "cousins," that is, he treated them as relatives. This affords us a guide as to what he means when he speaks of his

E "relatives" in the residuary clause. Secondly, he divides his residue among his "relatives hereinbefore named" who may fulfil certain conditions, and he repeats this provision by confirmation in a codicil at a time when in the events which had happened there would be only one person to whom the residue would go if "named" means described by Christian or surname. Seeing that his attention, when making

F his fifth codicil, was necessarily directed to the point who would take under the residuary clause, I think it unreasonable to suppose that he meant to leave one person to take under a provision which directed a division among several. This (as it appears to me) unreasonable conclusion is avoided by interpreting the word "named" in one of its recognised meanings as "designated," and I therefore adopt that interpretation. I think the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

The plaintiffs shipped a cargo of cement in the defendants's ship under a bill of lading which contained the usual exceptions including that of perils of the sea, but which omitted an exception of negligence. The ship was stranded on the journey and the cargo was damaged. In an action brought by the plaintiffs for damage to the cargo,

Held: as the damage was apparently caused by a peril of the sea, the burden of showing that the defendants were not entitled to the benefit of that exception because of their negligence lay on the plaintiffs.

H

I

A Appeal from a decision of SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in an action in which the plaintiffs, Messrs. J. C. Johnson & Co. and H. F. Currie & Co., sought to recover from the defendants, Messrs. Wainwright Brothers & Co., the sum of £387 16s. 1d., being the value of 2,100 sacks of cement damaged by water while being conveyed by the steamship Glendarroch from London to Liverpool in March, 1893.

B The defendants had contracted to take the Glendarroch from London to Liverpool at their own risk, for repairs, and the plaintiffs' cement was taken on board as cargo, but primarily for purposes of ballast. In the course of her voyage the Glendarroch stranded in Cardigan Bay, and the plaintiffs' cement was damaged by water, and rendered useless.

C The plaintiffs sued the defendants as common carriers, but the defendants, while admitting that the goods were lost before the bills of lading were completed, contended that they were received on terms that it was agreed should be embodied in the bills of lading, which included the usual exceptions with regard to perils of the sea and a negligence clause. The plaintiffs did not allege negligence in their pleadings, but they were taken by the President as amended in that respect. He found that the goods were carried under the bills of lading alleged by the defendants, but that the alleged negligence clause had not been made out. He considered D himself bound by the dictum of LORD HERSCHELL in The Xantho (1) (12 App. Cas. at p. 512), and laid it down that the defendant has to show not only a peril of the sea, but a peril of the sea such as would exempt him under the bill of lading; that is, a peril not occasioned by the negligence of the defendant. Counsel for the defendants then declined to carry the case any further, contending that it would shift a burden on the defendants which really rested on the plaintiffs, and judgment E was accordingly entered for an agreed sum of £335. The defendants appealed.

Walton, Q.C., and W. F. Taylor for the defendants.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. A. Hamilton for the plaintiffs.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The contract being one on the ordinary terms of a bill of lading, the facts suggested are these, that the goods are shipped on these terms, F and that the defendant undertakes to deliver the goods at the end of the voyage unless the loss of the goods during the voyage comes within one of the exceptions in the bill of lading. The exception relied upon by the defendants here is that the goods were lost or damaged by the peril of the sea, and upon that it is alleged that even though that be true, yet that peril of the sea and that loss by peril of the sea was the result of negligent navigation on the part of the defendants' G sailors. It is the law that if that be made out the defendants have no defence, and the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed, and the real question is—how is that to be made out, if it can be made out? It is to be decided according to the practice of the law courts, and the question is, how is that result to be arrived at? The terms of the bill of lading as they stand on paper are, "except the loss be from perils of the sea." But then it is said that, nevertheless, if the perils of the H sea are produced by the negligence of the defendants' seamen, then that loss cannot be relied on by the defendants. How can that be unless there be an irresistible inference that such exception does exist in the contract, though it is not written in it? Therefore it must be read into it as if it were in it. Hence we must try and see whether this stipulation as to negligence must be written in, or be considered as written in.

I The liabilities of shipowners under a bill of lading are in that part which precedes the exceptions. Is this stipulation about the loss being the result of the negligence of the shipowners' servants, although within the terms of the exception to be written in before the exceptions or not? The first thing that strikes one is that in that part of the contract it is not wanted. It is immaterial. Before you come to the exceptions the liability of the shipowner is absolute. He has contracted that he will deliver the goods at the end of the voyage. If there were no exceptions it would be utterly immaterial whether the loss was caused by his servants or not. Even if there were no negligence whatever he would be liable. It cannot be, therefore, that you ought to write in this irresistible inference in that part of the contract. It is not wanted there; therefore you must write it into that part which contains the exceptions. A

When you come to the exceptions, among others there is the exception of perils of the sea. There are no words which say "Perils of the sea not caused by the negligence of the captain or crew". You have got to read those words in by a necessary inference. How can you read them in? You have got the plain words, in their ordinary sense, that the shipowner is relieved if the loss is a loss by perils of the sea in the ordinary sense of the word. But then you have to read in the other. You can only read it in, in my opinion, as an exception upon the exceptions. You must read in "Except the loss is by perils of the sea, unless or except that loss is the result of the negligence of the captain or sailors of the owner." That being so, I think that, according to the ordinary course of practice, each party would have to prove the part of the matter which lies upon him. The plaintiff would have to prove the contract and the non-delivery. If he leaves that in doubt, of course he fails. The defendant's answer is, "Yes, but my case was brought within the exception, within its ordinary meaning." That lies upon him. Then the plaintiff has a right to say there are exceptional circumstances—viz., that the damage was brought about by the negligence of the defendants' servants, and it seems to me that it is for the plaintiff to make out that second exception. B C D

Let us see whether that seems to have been the view of the older lawyers who had to deal with these disputes as to bills of lading. The old system of pleading, so far as it is a logical exercise carried into practice, was this, that the pleading should follow the burden of proof, so as to show distinctly which part of the transaction lay upon each person to prove. There was a declaration, which showed what the plaintiff had to prove in the first instance. There was the plea, which was prepared to show what the defendant was prepared to prove in answer to that; there was the replication, which admitted the plea was sufficient answer to the plaintiff unless he could answer it. But the replication might answer the plea so as to reinforce the declaration, and show that, by reason of what was in the replication, the plea had become, although prima facie an answer, not a sufficient one, and that the declaration was restored. That was the system and the logical system of the old pleading, for the purpose of the conduct of the trial, to show how the evidence and the proof was to be regulated. The declaration stated the bill of lading, and relying on the first and substantive part of the bill of lading alleged non-delivery. That was all the declaration came to state, and strictly speaking, I am of opinion that the declaration could not properly have stated anything about negligence, because negligence was immaterial. It was what the old pleaders called "leaping before you came to the stile," and a pleader was not called upon to answer that which at that time and at that moment was an immaterial allegation. Therefore the declaration was as I say. That showed what the plaintiff had to prove in the first instance, and the moment he did prove what was in his declaration, that was his case. Then came the defendant, and he had to answer that case. Then the plea is stated: "It is true that that is the contract, but the non-delivery was the result of a peril of the sea." He followed, therefore, the terms of the exception construed in their ordinary sense, that is, that the loss was a loss by perils of the sea. No plea that can be found in the books ever went on to say that the loss by perils of the sea was not caused by negligence. Yet, if the contention be true that the burden of proof to that extent lies on the defendant, every one of those pleas without that allegation was no answer to the declaration, and was open to demurrer. There is no such case in which a demurrer was brought forward and supported. As that was so, it showed it was no part of the proof which the defendant was bound to give. E F G H I

Then you have a long succession of cases, all setting out a replication, and that replication in the given case is: "Yes, it is true there was a loss by perils of the sea within the prima facie exception, but that was brought about by the negligence

A of your servants, i.e., by your captain and crew." The replication was there for the purpose of showing what the plaintiff had to prove. He could not depart from his declaration, but if he could support it by showing that the exception was not satisfied because there had been this negligence, then the case in the end was for the plaintiff. That being so, it seems to me that the course of pleading is as strong as it could be in favour of, what I think, the true construction of the contract

B shows, and the principles upon which such a construction was to be acted upon in the trial of the case when it came to be tried.

That being the state of things, is there any case to the contrary of that constant course of pleading, and of that result of the principle of construction of a bill of lading? I know of none, but I think there are cases which distinctly show that the course of pleading did give the right view of the different shiftings of the burden

C of proof. I think that Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. (2) is distinct on the point, and so also is Czech v. General Steam Navigation Co. (3). I think that the two Scottish cases of Craig and Rose v. Delargy (4) and Williams v. Dobbie (5) are as distinct and clear to the very point as cases can be. I therefore think that, unless there is something which will justify us in setting aside what I think is the principle of conduct arising from the true construction of the contract, and the universal mode of treating trials up to this time, that which is said in MR. CARVER'S

D book on CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY SEA (2nd Edn.) p. 89, which is the result of a very careful consideration of the cases, is correct, viz., that, if the loss apparently falls within the exception, the burden of showing that the shipowner is not entitled to the benefit of the exception on the ground of negligence is upon the person so contending. MR. CARVER cites those cases in support of the proposition. Of course

E the proposition in his book is not to be treated as authority, but I adopt that statement of the law, and I think it is right.

But it is said that a suggestion on a decision or an opinion of the greatest weight has been given to the contrary of what I think is the principle of conduct, and has been the universal practice in the conduct of trials for years and years. That is the opinion which is said to have been given by LORD HERSCHELL in The Xantho (1).

F I need hardly say that I have the greatest respect and regard for the legal opinion of LORD HERSCHELL in any mercantile case. I have reason to have that great respect, but reading what he said in The Xantho (1), I am of opinion that he positively declined to give an opinion. People may say that, looking through or into his words, they may see a tendency of his mind, but that is not an opinion. The tendency of his mind when he refuses to give an opinion is not in my judgment

G any opinion at all. I therefore do not for the time feel hampered by a supposed view of LORD HERSCHELL, which I feel, if the case ever goes before him for decision, and if he had that idea passing through his mind, he will not act upon. I think, therefore, that the law is clear that the burden of proving this negligence lies upon the plaintiff.

If that be true, what is the result of this case? When the first part of the trial

H was over, counsel for the plaintiffs proceeded to open his case. Naturally he opened with, "The goods were put on board the ship," which really was not a subject of dispute, and "The goods were not delivered." That was not a subject in dispute. There he might have stopped. He had proved his prima facie case, but knowing that the ship had really been stranded on the rocks and broken into, and the cargo destroyed, he naturally saw that there was a loss by perils of the sea in the

I ordinary sense of the term, and he therefore began to prepare the mind of the judge before the time, doing that which, if he had been an old pleader, would have been jumping before he came to the stile. He began to open that which he would have to prove on a replication that the perils of the sea had been caused by the negligence of the defendants' sailors. He might have taken that to be the real issue of the case, and then have opened the negligence which he alleged, and if he had evidence of it put in his evidence. But it is too soon; it is meeting the defendant before the defendant has made any case. He puts in the answers to the interrogatories, which immediately show that there has been a loss by perils of the sea in the ordinary sense, and I think that showed evidence, perhaps strong A evidence, that that was the result of negligent navigation.

But he was not content. I know what the refinement of his mind is, and he seems not to have been content to rely on that, because he would not risk his client's case upon that, and he endeavoured to get from the judge a ruling which made the whole of that immaterial. He endeavoured to get from the judge a ruling before the judge was bound to give it, on what would be the ultimate B question in the trial. He quoted The Xantho (1), and endeavoured to get from the judge a ruling that the burden of proof which lay upon the defendant was that he must not only prove loss by perils of the sea, but must prove that that was not the result of the negligence of his captain and crew. He obtained that ruling of the judge at that time. Counsel for the defendants at that time had not said he had nothing to answer. He had not said he would not call evidence. It was C after the plaintiffs' counsel had obtained that ruling of the judge, which to my mind would increase the obligation on the defendants' counsel, and put upon him the necessity of far stronger evidence than if that ruling did not exist, that the defendants' counsel said :

"After that ruling it is of no use for me to answer this specific allegation which you have made that my going out of my course and being out of my course was negligence."

If the defendants had shown that their being in Cardigan Bay was not the result of careless navigation and not keeping their course outside of Cardigan Bay, but that they had sufficient reason for going into Cardigan Bay, which would take away any real suggestion of its being carelessness to be in Cardigan Bay, that would not do. They must go on to prove that if they were in Cardigan Bay there was no negligence which conduced to the running on the rocks. It seems to me that the burden of proof thus laid upon them was greater than the law justified. Counsel for the defendants said, "No, I cannot undertake that burden. That is your ruling, and I must go to the Court of Appeal as you have made that ruling, and ask whether it is right or whether it is wrong, so as to enable me to continue my part of the trial, if there is to be a new trial." In my opinion the defendants were bound to come here in order to get that view of the court, and their counsel succeeded in convincing me that the learned judge has misconstrued that which was suggested to him as the authority of LORD HERSCHELL, and that he has given a ruling which was not according to law. I think, therefore, that as upon the point of the appeal the defendants have succeeded, they ought to have the costs of the appeal; but I also think that there seems to have been considerable misfortune in the mode in which the trial was conducted, and as the result, about which I give no opinion, is yet to be determined, I think there must be a new trial, and that under the circumstances the costs of the first trial must abide the event of the second. E

LOPES, L.J.—The question raised in this case is a somewhat difficult one, and the question is a question of onus of proof. As a general rule it may be said that the burden of proof lies on the person who affirms a particular thing. It appears to me in this case that the burden of proving that a loss which has happened is attributable to an excepted cause lies on the person who is setting it up. That in this case would be the defendants, the shipowners. If, however, the excepted cause by itself is sufficient to account for the loss, it appears to me that the burden of showing that there is something else which deprives the party of relying on the excepted cause lies on the person who set up that contention. That, in this case, would be the plaintiffs, who are the shippers. I think that is not only the result of the authorities, but of the pleadings before the Judicature Acts. H

The cases which have been referred to are: Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. (2); Czech v. General Steam Navigation Co. (3); Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steam Co. (6); P. and O. Steamship Co. v. Shand (7); and Wyld v. Pickford (8). These cases make good what I have stated with regard to the onus of I

A proof, namely, that where peril of the sea is set up it is sufficient for the defendants to prove the peril relied on, and he need not go on to show that that was really not caused by him, but if the plaintiffs say that it was, then they must set it up in their replication and must prove it. I have not heard a single case except one which I think is not an authority at all, which in any way negatives that proposition.

B But it is said there is a contrary opinion expressed by LORD HERSCHELL in The Xantho (1). He said (12 App. Cas. at p. 512):

C "Much argument was addressed to your Lordships on the question whether, when the plaintiffs had proved that the goods had not been delivered, thus throwing the onus on the defendants of excusing their non-delivery, proof by them that the vessel had been sunk in a collision would be sufficient to shift the onus, and render it incumbent on the plaintiffs to establish that the collision was due to the defendants' negligence, or whether the defendants, to bring themselves within the exception, must show that the loss was not due to a cause induced by their own negligence. I do not think that this point is now before your Lordships for decision. Arguments of weight have been adduced in support of either view."

D It is perfectly clear, therefore, that he does not intend to decide that point. He goes on to say:

"I certainly must not be understood as deciding that the mere proof of loss by collision, under circumstances as consistent with its resulting from the negligence of the carrying ship as from any other cause, would exonerate the defendants."

E That is the passage which is relied upon. Probably I think, reading it strictly, it might be said that if the learned Lord had an inclination of opinion at all it was in favour of that opinion which is put forward by the defendants' counsel; but the materiality of the whole passage is that it is not decided at all, and is left for further decision. Therefore, to put an extra-judicial dictum of that kind against a practice which has existed for a vast number of years would be most undesirable, and would be contrary to all precedents.

F In the result, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the learned President was misdirecting himself. The President says:

G "I think LORD HERSCHELL was rather inclined to the view that the defendant has to show not only a peril of the sea, but a peril of the sea such as would exempt him under the bill of lading, that is, a peril of the sea not occasioned by the negligence of the defendant."

H The learned judge so ruled, and was invited so to rule by counsel for the plaintiffs. Counsel for the defendants then said he left the case as it was. I think that is a clear misdirection by the learned judge, and such a misdirection as before the Judicature Acts would have necessitated a new trial. But under Ord. 39, r. 6, new trials are not granted unless there is some substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice. Speaking for myself, I do not hesitate to say that this is the matter in the case which has given me considerable trouble, but I am not prepared to say that a miscarriage of justice may not have occurred, for it makes all the difference where the onus of proof is held to be. I cannot, therefore, say that some injustice, or at any rate some substantial wrong, may not have been occasioned I to the defendants by the erroneous action which I consider the learned judge took in regard to this case.

DAVEY, L.J.—I am of opinion that counsel for the defendants has successfully shown what the form of pleading was when there were pleadings in matters of this description, namely, that negligence must either be alleged in the declaration or else be specially replied. It may be doubted whether it would require to be set out in the declaration, but in either case it was a matter which must be alleged and proved by the plaintiffs. The forms of pleading were not a mere technicality, but were framed in the manner in which they were so as to carry A out what is really a matter of substance, and, as the Master of the Rolls has clearly explained, that was the burden of proof followed and shifted from time to time, according to the matters alleged to have been pleaded. Nobody ever heard of a plea such as that in Phillips v. Clark (9) being demurred on, but if counsel for the defendants was right in saying that the burden of proof was on them, then he ought to have alleged it in his plea, and a plea merely stating one of the B excepted perils which did not go on to negative any suggestion of negligence would have been insufficient. I think the point is clearly put by PARKE, B., in Wyld v.

Pickford (8). That seems to me to bear out exactly what has been said, as also do the subsequent cases of Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. (2) and P. and O.
Steam Navigation Co. v. Shand (7). The judgment of WILLES, J., in Grill v.
General Iron Screw Collier Co. (2) appears to show that perils of the sea are C excepted, but that there is an implied contract by the shipowner that he will carry with care and caution, and his breach of that contract prevents him availing himself of the perils of the sea.

As to Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steam Co. (6) the present case is distinguished from that case, which turned entirely upon the construction of the word "thieves" in the exception in the bill of lading, and the court came to the D conclusion that the word "thieves" meant only as a matter of construction persons outside the vessel. That being so, of course the defendant had to bring himself within the excepted perils, and if that was not one of the excepted perils properly considered by the court, he did not bring himself within the excepted perils.
Therefore, I think that case cannot be relied upon.

I confess I have great doubt whether counsel for the defendants had anything in E substance to complain of, because there was evidence raising a prima facie case of negligence, and the learned judge might, it is admitted, have said to him, "There is a prima facie case of negligence raised by the plaintiff for you to answer," and he would have put in his evidence in answer to that. If the learned judge had taken that course, there could not have been, so far as I can see, anything to complain of. There are some subsequent words by the plaintiffs' counsel, F after the learned judge decided the point—words which warn counsel for the defendants about the interrogatories and the evidence produced from the lighthouse; but these words were subsequent to the very clear judgment delivered by the learned President, and the defendants' counsel had announced the course which on that judgment he intended to take. I think that observation of counsel for the defendants, though perhaps kindly meant, is not sufficient to alter or qualify the G effect of the finding of the learned judge. It is to be further observed that the learned judge seems never to have found as the basis of his judgment that there was negligence in fact, but to have given judgment for the plaintiffs on the ground that it was the defendants' business to negative negligence, and that he had not done so. On consideration it seems to me difficult to say that the defendants might not be prejudiced by the way in which the case was decided, because the evidence H might have been so evenly balanced, or the witnesses on one side or the other might not have been thoroughly believed, that the ultimate decision might finally turn on the question on whom the burden of proof lay. On these grounds I agree with the judgment which the Master of the Rolls has given.

Contract—Performance—Time for performance—Carriage of goods by sea—Discharge—Reasonable time—"Reasonable"—Circumstances at time of performance to be considered.

When the language of a contract does not expressly, or by necessary implication, fix any time for the performance of a contractual obligation, the law implies that it shall be performed within a reasonable time. In determining whether or not more than a reasonable time was occupied the circumstances which actually existed at the time of performance must be considered, not the ordinary circumstances which would normally attend the performance. The rule is of universal application, and it applies to contracts for the carriage of goods by sea as to other contracts.

Accordingly, where goods consigned to the respondents were shipped on board a ship of the appellant under bills of lading which contained no stipulation as to the time within which the respondents were to discharge the cargo, the ship duly arrived at her port of discharge, and the unloading was commenced, but before it was completed a strike by the dock labourers took place so that the completion of the unloading was delayed for a considerable time,

Held: in view of the circumstances existing at the port at the time of the discharge the respondents were not liable for the delay.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Dec. 16, 1892. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—This action was brought by the appellant, who is a shipowner, against the respondents, who were consignees and holders of the bills of lading of a cargo carried on board the plaintiff's steamship Derwentdale, to recover damages for the detention of the vessel during her discharge at the port of London.

By the bills of lading the cargo was to be delivered in good order and condition "at the port of London." On Aug. 14, 1889, the vessel arrived in the Millwall Dock, and was reported to the Custom House. The discharge of the wheat, of which the cargo consisted, commenced on Aug. 16. On Aug. 20, a strike of dock labourers began in the port of London, and some of the labourers engaged in the discharge of the Derwentdale then ceased to work. A few days later the strike became general, and no work was done in the discharge of the vessel until Sept. 16, when it was recommenced, and finished on the 18th. Evidence was given that, apart from the strike, the discharge of the vessel would have been completed in six days. The dock company were employed by the respondents to discharge the vessel. Only the trimming of the cargo was to be the work of the shipowner, otherwise the entire obligation to discharge the vessel rested on the consignees.

At the commencement of the trial, in the course of the discussion which took place whether the case should be heard with or without a jury, certain admissions were made by the learned counsel, and I think it well to state at the outset what I take to be the facts, either proved or admitted. I think it must be taken that, throughout the whole of the time during which the discharge ceased, and the dock company were unable to supply labour to effect it, it was not possible for the respondents either to find any other person to provide the labour or themselves to obtain the necessary labour in any other way. If the terms of the bills of lading had required the discharge to be effected in any particular number of days, it is quite clear that the burden of the delay caused by the difficulty of obtaining labour would have fallen upon them, and it would have

A been no answer to a charge that they had failed to fulfil their obligation to say that the circumstances had rendered it impossible for them to do so. The bills of lading in the present case contained no such stipulation, and, therefore, in accordance with ordinary and well-known principles, the obligation of the respondents was that they should take discharge of the cargo within a reasonable time.

B The question is: Has the plaintiff proved that this reasonable time has been exceeded? This depends upon what circumstances may be taken into consideration in determining whether more than a reasonable time was occupied. The appellant's contention is that, inasmuch as the obligation to take discharge of the cargo and to provide the necessary labour for that purpose rested upon the respondents, the test is what time would have been required for the discharge of the vessel under ordinary circumstances, and that, inasmuch as they have to provide the labour, they must be responsible if the discharge is delayed beyond that period. The respondents, on the other hand, contend that the question is not what time would have been necessary, or what time would have been reasonable under ordinary circumstances, but what time was reasonable under existing circumstances, assuming that, in so far as the existing circumstances were extraordinary, they were not due to any act or default on the part of the respondents.

D There appears to me to be no direct authority upon the point, although there are judgments bearing on the subject to which I will presently call attention. I would observe, in the first place, that there is of course no such thing as a reasonable time in the abstract. It must always depend upon circumstances. Upon "the ordinary circumstances," say the learned counsel for the appellant. E But what may without impropriety be termed the ordinary circumstances differ in particular ports at different times of the year. As regards the practicability of discharging a vessel they may differ in summer and winter. Again, weather increasing the difficulty of, though not preventing, the discharge of a vessel may continue for so long a period that it may justly be termed extraordinary. Could it be contended that, in so far as it lasted beyond the ordinary period, the delay F caused by it was to be excluded in determining whether the cargo had been discharged within a reasonable time? It appears to me that the appellant's contention would involve constant difficulty and dispute, and that the only sound principle is that the "reasonable time" should depend on the circumstances which actually exist. If the cargo had been taken with all reasonable despatch under those circumstances, I think the obligation of the consignee has been fulfilled. G When I say the circumstances which actually exist, I, of course, imply that those circumstances, in so far as they involve delay, have not been caused or contributed to by the consignee.

I think the balance of authority, both as regards the cases which relate to contracts by a consignee to take discharge and those in which the question what is a reasonable time has had to be answered when analogous observations H were under consideration, is distinctly in favour of the view taken by the court below. In Postlethwaite v. Freeland (1) the law was stated by LORD SELBOURNE, L.C., thus:

I "If, on the other hand, there is no fixed time, the law implies an agreement to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time; that is, as was said by BLACKBURN, J., in Ford v. Cotesworth (2), a reasonable time under the circumstances."

In the same case LORD BLACKBURN clearly indicated that this view of the law was, in his opinion, correct and in accordance with the current of previous authority; and he not only quoted with approval the law laid down in Taylor v. Great Northern Rail. Co. (3), that "a reasonable time" meant what was reasonable under the circumstances as distinguished from "the ordinary time," which it had been contended was the same thing as a reasonable time, but stated that, in his opinion, the law so laid down was applicable to the case then under consideration. A
